An.D.1475. Aug. 19.

(98) The day approached, and the two Kings come to the place, he of France came first to the Grate, accompanied with twelue personages, as was the appointment; whereof Iohn Duke of Bourbon, and the Cardinall his Brother, were the chiefest: King Edward entring the Bridge on the other end, with his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Chancellor, himselfe apparrelled all in cloth of Gold, with a rich Iewell of precious stones, in forme of a Flower de Luce: aduanced forward, and within fiue foote of the Grate, put off his Cap, and bowed his knee within halfe a foote to the Ground. King Lewis as readily doing his likely reuerence vnto Edward. Where, after imbracements through the Grate, the Chancellour of England, who was Prelate and Bishop of Ely, made an eloquent and learned Oration; which done, he read the Articles of peace, and demanded the Kings whether these were done with their full consents. Which granted by both: either of them laying their one hand vpon the Missall, and the other vpon the Holy-Crosse, tooke their solemne Oathes to obserue the same. And then falling into a more familiar and Courtly Complementall conference, King Lewis tolde King Edward, that he would one day inuite him to Paris, there to Court his faire French Ladies, with whom if he committed any sinne, he merrily told him, that Cardinall Bourbon, should be his Confessor, whose penance should be the easier, for that Bourbon vsed to busse faire Ladies himselfe; which no sooner was spoken, or howsoeuer meant, but Edward was as forward of thankes and acceptance, and indeed so ready, that King Lewis rounding Gomines his bosome-seruant in his eare, tolde him flatly he liked not Edwards forwardnesse to Paris, too many English Princes haue beene there before: and thus the conference ended, and King Edwards businesse in France, he returned into England, and into the City of London was receyued little lesse then in triumph-wise.

(99) But though Edwards fortunes thus outwardly flourished, yet inward feares nipped his still troubled mind, one branch hauing sap, whose growth he much feared would shadow his Crowne, which was Henry Earle of Richmond, aliue, and at liberty in the Duke of Britains Court. To bring therefore his purpose to passe, he sent D. Stillington, and others, Ambassadors vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with store of Gold and good words, as that he meant to match his eldest daughter Lady Elizabeth vnto the young Earle of Richmond, whereby all cause of dissentions might at once be cut off: the Duke thinking no danger where the water went smooth, easily consented to ship him thereon; but ere the prey was embarked, he had knowledge that the voyage should cost young Henry his life; wherefore in all hast he sent his Treasurer Peter Landoys to preuent it, who secretly told Richmond what marriage-bed Edward intended; whereat the distressed Earle amazed, was put to his shifts, and for want of better, tooke Sanctuary at S^t. Malos, where the English his conductors lay for a wind.

Henry Earle of Richmond, sought after by King Edward.

An intent pretended, which after came to passe.

Henry, Earle of Richmond, taketh Sanctuary.

(100) The Earle thus escaped, the Ambassadors complained to the Duke, imputing the fault as farre as they durst vnto him, who had not dealt like a good Merchant to take their money, and to retaine the wares; his answere was, the deliuery was good, but themselues negligent Factors, that made not the commodity to their best aduantage. And yet for the loue he bare to their King, he vndertooke that Richmond should be sure kept either in Sanctuarie, or else in Prison, whence as he promised hee should not escape: And so with a flea in their eare, they returned, hauing cleared Edward of his money, and care for sure keeping of Henry, who though he were sore displeased with Stillingtons simplicity; yet the promises that the Duke of Britaine had made, much mitigated and eased his minde.

His Answere.

(101) And now the Realme quiet, no Warre in hand, nor none towards (but such as no man looked should happen;) he framed himselfe so to the peoples affections, as held their hearts not in a constrained feare, but with as louing and ready obedience as any King attaining the Crowne by his Sword euer had done. Nor was euer any Prince more familiar with his Subjects then this King Edward was; for now hauing his tribute truely paide from France, and all things prospering as was desired, he set heart vpon pleasure, which hetherto had beene afflicted with continuall turmoyle: yea, and often laid from him the state of a Prince, and would accompany and conuerse with his meane subiects: a loadstone that doth naturally attract the English hearts; among many others we of London remember this to our grace: Vnto Windsore he sent for the Lord Maior of London, the Aldermen and others, vpon no other occasion, then to hunt in his company, and himselfe to be merry with them: As also at another time he did the like in Waltham, where he gaue them most familiar intertainment, and sent to the Lady Mairesse and her sisters two Harts, sixe Buckes, and a Tunne of Wine, which wan more loue then manifold their worthes.

King Edward beloued of his subjects, and loueth his subjects.

John Stow. King Edward sent for the Maior and Aldermen of London to his huntings.

(102) Somewhat he was giuen to Court and conuerse with faire Ladies, which fault was well noted and preuented by King Lewis, for his French Dames: but in England he had libertie with very large scope, for, besides the Lady Lucy and others, by whom he had issue, three Concubines he kept, and those of three diuers and seuerall dispositions, as himselfe would often confesse; one the merriest, another the wiliest, and the third the holiest Harlot in his Realme, as one whom no man could get out of the Church, vnlesse it were to his Bed; the merriest was Shores Wife, of whom hereafter we shall speake; the other two were greater Personages, but in their humility are content to be nameless, and to forbeare the praise of those properties.

K. Edward somewhat licentiously giuen.

K. Edwards three Concubines.

(103) This fault of the King did not greatly offend the people: for one mans pleasure could not extend to the displeasures of many, it being done without violence, and in his latter dayes lessened and well left. But a farre more greater sinne and reproach he fell into, among his other Princely disports: For being on progresse in Warwickshire, and hunting in Arrow-Parke, belonging to Thomas Burdet Esquire, with the death of much Game he slew a White Bucke, greatly esteemed of the said Burdet, who vnderstanding thereof, wished his hornes in his Belly, that moued the King to kill the same Bucke; whereof he was accused and condemned of treason, his words being drawne, to wish the hornes in the Kings Belly: for which, beheaded he was at Tiburne, and buried in the Gray-Fryers Church at London.

(104) But a more lamentable tragedie happened vnto the Land, by the death of George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, who being accused of high Treason, was committed to the Tower, where he soone after ended his life. His attainder was, that the said Duke had caused diuers of his seruants to enforme the people, that Thomas Burdet his seruant likewise, was wrongfully put to death: and further laboured (through their reports) to make the World beleeue, that King Edward wrought by Nigromancie, and vsed to poyson such subiects as he hated: And also that the said Duke vpon purpose to exalt himselfe and his heires to the Regall dignitie, most falsly and vntruly published that the King was a Bastard, and therefore not capable of raigne. Moreouer that he induced diuerse of the Kings naturall subjects to be sworne vpon the blessed Sacrament, vnto him and his heires, without any other reseruations of their alleagiance: for which intent (as there was alledged) alledged) he had gotten an exemplification vnder the great Seale of King Henry the ſixt, that if the ſaid King and his ſonne Prince Edward dyed without iſſue male, the ſaid Duke and his heires ſhould injoy the Crowne: For theſe, in a Parliament begun at VVeſtminſter the fifteenth of Ianuary, he was attainted of high treaſon: but whether guiltie or guiltleſſe, to men (ſaith Grafton) that haue made large inquiſition, yea, and of ſuch as were of no ſmall authority in thoſe dayes, the certaintie thereof was hid, and could not truely be diſcloſed, but by conjectures, which as often deceiue the imaginations of fantaſticall folke, as declare truth to them in their concluſions.

(105) I am not ignorant that ſome haue alledged the cauſe of this Noble-mans death to ariſe from a fooliſh prophecy (whereof ſaith Comines) the Engliſhmen are neuer vnfurniſhed, and this as the Cabaliſts, who vſed to make an art of their Letters, gaue forth forſooth that a G. ſhould raigne after an E. which muſt needes be George Duke of Clarence, though Glouceſter, more crafty, lay in winde for the game. This indeed troubled the King not a little, but the Queene and her bloud much more, and therefore of both King and Queene Duke George was miſtruſted, and greatly maligned in all that he did. Who now a Widdower (for Warwicks daughter was dead) ſent vnto his ſiſter Margaret the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, to worke a marriage for him with her Husbands daughter the Lady Marie. Againſt which the Queene moſt earneſtly interpoſed her ſelfe, and ſollicited the Ladie in the behalfe of Lord Anthonie Earle Riuers her brother, whereby great diſcontent was miniſtred to the Duke, and new jealouſies daily bred in the Kings breaſt.

(106) Iohn Serres, the French Hiſtorian, interlacing the life of King Lewis with the Acts of King Edward and his Brethren, ſaith confidently, that the Engliſh King ſo much affected the league and alliance with France, as that he cauſed his brother Clarence to be put in priſon, becauſe he intended to haue paſt the Seas to ſuccour the Dowager of Burgundy Ladie Margaret his Siſter, vpon whoſe Territories King Lewis encroached, after the death of Duke Charles her husband, ſlaine at the battell of Mancy.

(107) But howſoeuer Clarence had offended, certaine it is, that he was found guilty by the foreſaid Parliament, and the eleauenth of March following, after he had offered his Maſſe-penny in the Tower of London, was drowned in a But of Malmeſey, whoſe body was buried at Tewkesburie in Glouceſterſhire, by the bodie of his Dutcheſſe Lady Iſabell Counteſſe of VVarwicke, who being with Childe, died of poiſon a little before. And although the King had conſented to his death, yet no ſooner was it done, but that he wiſhed it againe vndone, and was ſo grieued at the remembrance, as when any made ſuite for the life of a condemned, he would openly ſay: Oh vnfortunate brother, for whoſe life no man would make ſuite. This good Duke (for ſo was hee called) left iſſue behinde him, Edward Earle of VVarwicke and Margaret afterwards Counteſſe of Salisbury, both of them Infants, and followers of their fathers fortunes: he a continuall Priſoner, at foure and twenty yeares of age, vnder Henry the ſeauenth, was beheaded vpon the Tower-hill; and ſhee at ſixty two, loſt hers within the Tower, and time of King Henrie the eight.

(108) But how dainty ſoeuer King Edward was of the breach of amitie betwixt him and the French King, in regard whereof he ſuffered Mary the young Dutcheſſe of Burgundy the daughter of his owne ſiſters Husband to be moleſted by intruſion of the French, and all in fauour of the contract commenced between the Daulphin & Lady Elizabeth his daughter, yet did Lewis for his part but dally and driue out time: For Ambaſſadors imployed for the full accompliſhing thereof, they of France came either without commiſſion, or thoſe re-called, the new were ſent without inſtructions, while indeede Lewis was working for his ſonne another way: Firſt to match him with Mary Dutches of Burgundy, but that refuſed, with Margaret of Flaunders, daughter to Duke Maximilian, ſonne to Fredericke the Emperour: and to hold the world from ſuſpition, in the meane-while Lady Elizabeth the Infanta of England was in the French Court vſually called Madame the Daulphin, and all things in France ſo ſoundly carried, as Edward ſuſpected no leake in the Caske: for now growne fat and vnable for paines, he both gloried in his nine famous victories at home atchieued, and ſeemed ſufficiently ſatisfied, that his yearely tribute from France was ſo truely paide.

Lady Elizabeth called Madame the Daulphin.

(109) At the ſame time Iames the third of that name, King of Scotland, ſent his Ambaſſadours vnto Edward to obtaine the Lady Cicelie, the Kings ſecond daughter, to be joyned in marriage with his ſonne Iames the young Prince, which was well liſtened vnto by Edward and his Counſell, and leaſt the motion ſhould goe backe, a great ſumme of money lent to the Scottiſh King, with this condition, that at a certain time appoynted, it ſhould be at K. Edwards choiſe, whether his daughter ſhould match with that Prince, or elſe to haue the ſaide ſumme againe re-paide. Againſt which alliance and league (as Leſlie reporteth) Lewis of France much repined, and to annihilate the ſame, ſent Dr. Ireland, a certaine Knight, and another religious man, to moue King Iames to make warre againſt England.

(110) Theſe no Peace-makers for Chriſt, but firebrands of Belial, blew the ſmothered ſparkes of diſſention into a flame of bloudy warre, which fell the more heauy vpon Scotland, for that K. Iames much wedded vnto his owne will, and altogether ruled by men of meane worth, whom himſelfe had aduanced from nothing, had not only neglected by their inſtigations the loue of his Nobles, but alſo baniſhed the Realme of Scotland, Alexander Duke of Albany his ſecond brother; and had cauſed the veines of Iohn Earle of Marre, his other Brother, to be opened, whereby he bled to death; theſe and other diſcontents alienated his Subjects hearts from him, which laid the land more open vnto the Engliſh Inuaders; and yet to draw them more deadly againſt him, relying vpon his owne valor, and the aſſiſtance of France; he ſent word vnto Edward, that he ſhould not aid his owne ſiſter of Burgundy againſt K. Lewis, being the Scots Ally; as alſo with threats of warre commanded him to deliuer to his Ambaſſadors, the Duke of Albanie (then reſiding in the Engliſh Court) and laſtly to make good and re-pay dammages done vpon the Scottiſh Borders.

(111) King Edward not a little inraged at theſe double dealings, euen in the winter ſeaſon muſtered his men, prepared his artillery, and rigged his ſhips; that nothing ſhould be vnready at the next Spring; which no ſooner was come, but that he ordayned for his Lieutenant his brother Richard Duke of Glouceſter, who with Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Lord Stanley, the Lord Louell, Greiſtock, and others, (the Duke of Albany marching vnder Glouceſters Banner) with twenty thouſand ſtrong repayred into the North: and firſt beſieged the ſtrong Towne Berwicke, then entring the chiefe City Edenburgh, vrged King Iames to performe his couenants concerning the marriage betwixt Prince Iames his Sonne, with Lady Cicelie, before agreed vpon, threatning deſtruction if the match went not forward. The Scottiſh Nobility conſidering the eminent danger, put to death the wicked Counſellers of their King, ordayned the Duke of Albany the Vicegerent of Scotland; and promiſed to re-pay the money receyued according to Couenants; after which, with the deliuery of the ſtrong Towne Berwicke, which had beene out of the Engliſh poſſeſſion the ſpace of one & twenty yeares, a generall peace was concluded betwixt the two Realmes. King Lewis dallieth with King Edward.

(112) The marriage with Scotland thus broken off; that with Scotland for the Lady Cicely, by King Edward himſelfe; that with France for the Princeſſe Elizabeth, both he and his Queene greatly deſired, and daily ſought after: But Lewis the French King, finding the daughter of Auſtrich more fit for his ſonne, dallied out Edward with ſhewes of firme faith, till he had effected the thing he went about: which muſicke ſounded ſo harſhly in the Engliſh Kings eare, when he heard it, as in no wiſe he would ſuffer that ſtring to be touched, but euer beleeued that the French meant him faire play, and although the yeares of the parties themſelues might beget ſome ſuſpition, ſhe being much elder then the Daulphin, and the truth thereof confirmed by the Duke of Auſtriches Leger-Ambaſſadours reſiding in England, yet Edward would not ſo much as ſuppoſe a ſuſpect againſt the French King, and therefore ſuffered Lewis to incroach vpon thoſe parts of Picardie that joyned to Callis, and to gaine time till it was paſt re-call: for then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him that he was preſent, and ſaw the Lady Margaret of Auſtrich, daughter to Duke Maximilian, ſonne to the Emperor Frederick, receiued vnto France with great pompe and royaltie: and at Ambois contracted and eſpouſed to the Daulphin.

A warre pretended againſt France.

(113) Edward mightily chafed to be thus worked by Lewis, made great preparation for France, but whether with anger, griefe, or melancholy, he fell into a dangerous and deadly ſickneſſe; ſome ſay, of a ſuperfluous ſurfeit, whereunto he was much giuen: Comines ſaith, of a Catarrhe, which weake eſtate turned his minde another way: for calling his Lords into his ſicke preſence, and raiſing his faint body vpon his Bed-Pillowes, theſe words vnto them he laſtly ſpake:

King Edward falleth ſicke.

"(114) My Lords, my deare Kinſmen, & Allies; "in what plight I lye, you ſee, and I feele; by which "the leſſe while I looke to liue with you, the more "deepely am I mooued to care in what caſe I leaue "you; for ſuch as I leaue you, ſuch be my children "like to finde you. Which if they ſhould (that "God forbid) finde you at variance, might hap to "fall themſelues at warre, ere their diſcretion would "ſerue to ſet you at peace. Yee ſee their youth, of "which I reckon the only ſurety to reſt in your con-"cord. For it ſufficeth not that all you loue them, "if each of you hate other. If they were men, your "faithfulneſſe happely would ſuffice: but Childe-"hood muſt be maintayned by mens authoritie, "and ſlippery youth vnder-propped with elder "counſell; which neither they can haue, vnleſſe you "giue it, nor you giue it, if you agree not. For "where each laboureth to breake that which the "other maketh, and through hatred of each others "perſon impugneth each others counſell, there muſt "it needes be long or any good concluſion goe for-"ward: And while eyther party ſtriueth to be "chiefe, flatterie ſhall haue more play then plaine "and faithfull aduiſe, of which muſt needes inſue the "euill bringing vp of the Prince; whoſe minde in "tender youth infected, ſhall readily fall to riot and "miſchiefe; and draw downe with him his noble "Realme vnto ruine: but if grace turne him to "wiſdome: which if God ſend, then they that by e-"uill meanes before pleaſed him beſt, ſhall after fall "furtheſt out of fauour, ſo that euer at length euill "drifts draw to nought, and good plaine waies pro-"ſper. Great variance hath there long time beene "betweene you, not alwaies for great cauſes. Some-"time a thing right-well intended, our miſconſtru-"ctions turneth vnto worſe, or a ſmall diſpleaſure "done vs, either our owne affections or euill tongues "agreeueth. But this wot I well, yee neuer had ſo "great cauſe of hatred, as you haue of loue. That wee "be all men, that we be Chriſtian men, this ſhall I "leaue for Preachers to tell you (and yet I wot nere "whether any Preachers words ought more to "moue you, then his, that is by and by, going to the "place that they all preach of.) But this I ſhall de-"ſire you to remember, that the one part of you is "of my bloud, the other of my Allies; and each of "you with other, either of kinred or affinitie; which "ſpirituall kindred of affinitie, if the Sacraments of "Chriſts Church beare that weight with vs, that "would to God they did, ſhould no leſſe moue vs "to charitie, then the reſpect of fleſhly conſangui-"nitie. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the "worſe for the ſelfe cauſe, that you ought to loue "the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where "finde we ſo deadly debate, as among them, which "by nature and law ought moſt to agree together. "Such a peſtilent Serpent is ambition, and deſire of "vaine-glory and Soueraigntie, which among States "where it once entreth, creepeth forth ſo farre, till "with diuiſion and variance he turneth all to miſ-"chiefe, firſt longing to be next the beſt, afterward "equall with the beſt, and at laſt chiefe and aboue "the beſt. Of which immoderate appetite of wor-"ſhip, and thereby of debate and diſſention, what "loſſe, what ſorrow, what trouble, hath within theſe "few yeares growne in this Realme, I pray God as "well forget as we remember. Which things, if I "could aſwell haue fore-ſeen, as I haue with my more "paine then pleaſure proued, By Gods bleſſed La-"dy (that was euer his oath) I would neuer haue "won the curteſie of mens knees, with the loſſe of "ſo many heads. But ſith things paſſed cannot be "gaine-called, much ought we the more beware, by "what occaſion we haue taken ſo great hurt afore, "that we eft-ſoones fall not into the like againe. "Now be thoſe griefes paſſed, and all is (God be "thanked) quiet, and likely right-well to proſper in "wealthfull peace vnder your Coſins, my children, "if God ſend them life, and you loue. Of which "two things the leſſe loſſe were they, by whom "though God did his pleaſure yet ſhould the realme "alway find Kings, and peraduenture as good Kings. "But if you among your ſelues in a childes raigne fall "at debate, many a good man ſhall periſh, and hap-"pely hee too, and yee too, ere this Land find peace "againe. Wherefore in theſe laſt words that euer I "looke to ſpeake with you, I exhort, and require you "all, for the loue that you haue euer borne vnto me: "for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto you, for "the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all, from this "time forward all griefes forgotten, each of you loue "others, which I verily truſt you will, if you any "thing regard, eyther GOD, or your King, affini-"tie, or kindred, this Realme, your owne Countrey, "or your owne ſuretie.

(119) Edward the eldeſt ſonne of King Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was borne in the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter the fourth of Nouember, and yeare of grace 1471. being the tenth of his Fathers raigne, at that time expulſed the Realme by the powerfull Earle Warwicke; but fortune changed, and the Father reſtored; the ſonne, the firſt of Iuly and yeare of Chriſt 1473. was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter; and had not the ambitious hand of his Vncle beene defiled in his innocent bloud, he might haue worne the Diademe many yeares, whereas he bare the Title of King not many dayes.

An.D.1478. Stowe

(120) Richard the ſecond ſonne of K. Edward the fourth by Elizabeth his Queen, was borne at Shrewſbury, and in his infancy was created Duke of Yorke, he was affianced vnto Anne daughter and heire to Iohn Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, by which hee was intituled Duke of Norfolke, Earle-Marſhall, Warren, and Nottingham, but inioying neither Title, wife, or his owne life long, was with his Brother murthered in the Tower of London, and in the priſon of that Tower, which vpon that moſt ſinfull deed, is euer ſince called the bloudy Tower, their bodies as yet vnknowne where to haue buriall.

(121) George the third ſonne of K. Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was alſo borne in Shrewsbury, and being a young Child was created Duke of Bedford, but liued not long after, and lyeth buried at Windſore.

(122) Elizabeth the firſt daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Elizabeth his Queene, was borne at Weſtminſter the eleauenth of February, and fift of her Fathers raigne, being the yeere of Saluation 1466. She was promiſed in marriage to Charles Daulphin of France, woed and Courted by her Vncle Crouchbacke, when he had murthered her brothers, and vſurped the Crowne, but better deſtiny attending her, ſhee was reſerued to ioyne the vnion and marriage with the onely heire of Lancaſter, which was Henrie of Richmond, afterward King of England, from whom is branched the royall ſtemme that ſpreadeth his beautie in this North-weſt world, euen Iames our dread Soueraigne, and great-Britaines Monarch.

(123) Cicelie, the ſecond daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was ſought vnto by Iames the third of that name, to be ioyned in marriage with Iames his ſonne Prince of Scotland, and Duke of Rothſay, which match was promiſed vpon conditions and choiſe of K. Edward, who laſtly brake off from further proceeding, and the Lady married vnto Iohn Viſcount Wels, whom ſhee outliued, and was againe re-married, but by neither Husband had any iſſue, and therefore leſſe noted; her body lyeth buried at Quarrena in the Iſle of Wight.

(124) Anne the third daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was married vnto Lord Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marſhall, and high Treaſurer of England: vnto whom ſhee bare two ſonnes, both dying without iſſue, and her ſelfe without more fruit of wombe, left her life, and lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolke.

(125) Bridget the fourth daughter of King Edward the fourth, by his wife Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Eltham in Kent, the tenth of Nouember, & yeare of Grace 1480. being the twentieth of her Fathers Raigne. She tooke the habite of Religion, and became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford, in the ſame County, founded by King Edward the third, where ſhee ſpent her life in contemplations vnto the day of her death.

(126) Marie the fift daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his Wife, was promiſed in marriage vnto the King of Denmarke, but died (before it could be ſolemnized) in the Tower of Greenewich, the Sunday before Pentecoſt, the twentieth two of her Fathers Raigne, and yeare of Grace 1482. and was buried at Windſore.

(127) Margaret the ſixt daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by his wife Queene Elizabeth, died an Infant without other mention in our Authors.

(128) Katherine the ſeauenth daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, and the laſt of them both, was married vnto William Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, and Lord of Ochampton, vnto whom ſhe bare Lord Henrie after the death of his father Earle of Deuonſhire, who by King Henry the eight was created Marqueſſe of Exceſter in Anno 1525.

His Concubines.

(129) Elizabeth Lucie is certainly known to haue beene King Edwards Concubine, though nothing ſo certainely mentioned, whoſe Lady, or of what Parentage ſhe was; that ſhee was conceiued by him with-child is before declared, but who that childe was, is as obſcurely laid downe; therefore in theſe things we muſt be ſilent, and leaue the doubts to be reſolued by others. Three other Concubines this king had, whereof Shores Wife was not the leaſt beloued, whoſe life falleth falleth further to be ſpoken of in the Raigne of the vſurper Richard, where her ſtorie ſhall bee ſhewed more at large.

His naturall Iſſue.

(150) Arthur, ſurnamed Plantagenet, the naturall ſonne of K. Edward the fourth, (whoſe mother as is ſuppoſed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucie) was created Viſcount Liſle by King Henrie the eight at Bridewell in London, the twentie ſixt of Aprill, and yeare of Saluation 1533. which title was conferred vpon him in right of his Wife Lady Elizabeth, ſiſter and heire vnto Iohn Gray Viſcount Liſle, and the late wife and then widdow of Edmund Dudley: who bare vnto this Viſcount three daughters, which were Bridget, Frances, and Elizabeth, all of them afterward married. This Arthur Lord Liſle was made Lieutenant of Callis by the ſaid K. Henrie, which Towne ſome of his ſeruants intended to haue betrayed to the French, for which their fact himſelfe was ſent to the Tower of London: but his truth appearing after much ſearch, the King ſent him a rich ring from his owne finger, with ſuch comfortable words, as at the hearing ther-of a ſudden ioy ouercharged his heart, and was ſo immoderately receiued, that the ſame night it made an end of his life, whoſe body was honorably buried in the ſame Tower.

(151) Elizabeth the naturall daughter of King Edward the fourth, was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight, the Sonne of George Lord Lumley, who dyed before his Father: ſhee bare vnto the ſaid Sir Thomas, Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did deſcend.

EDWARD

Edward V.

EDWARD THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIF FIFTH MONARCH OF THIS LAND, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

Monarch 55

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE Father thus dying in the ſtrength of his yeares, and the Sonne left to rule before hee was ripe, the Synders of diſſenſions which the ſicke King had lately raked vp, preſently brake forth into a more raging flame; for the King and Queenes bloud that ſhould haue ſupported young Edwards eſtate, the one ſide being ſuſpicious, and the other prouoked by the execrable deſire of ſoueraignty, left the tender King (a Prince of ſuch towardneſſe as his age could containe), deſtitute and vn-armed, which if either kinde or kindred had holden place, muſt needs haue beene the ſureſt pillars of his defence. The raigne of this King (if wee may ſo call the ſhort time of his Soueraignty) began the ſame day that his Father died, though hee was neuer Crowned, nor yet commanded the affaires of the Kingdome as an abſolute Monarch, his young brothers fortunes being ballanced with his.

April 19. An.D.1483. Richard Duke of Yorke.

(2) For Richard Duke of Glouceſter, by nature their Vncle, by office their Protector, to their Father beholden, to themſelues by Oath and Alleagiance bounden, all bands broken that holdeth man and man together, without any reſpect of God or the World, vnnaturally contriued to bereaue them, not onely of their dignity, but alſo their liues. But forſomuch as the Dukes demeanour miniſtreth in effect all the whole matter whereof the raigne of this young and fift Edward muſt intreate, it is therefore conuenient, ſomewhat to ſhew you ere we goe further, what man man this was, and from whom hee deſcended that could find in his heart ſo much miſchiefe to conceiue.

Richard Duke of Yorke was the father of Richard Duke of Gloceſter.

(3) Know firſt then that Richard Duke of Yorke, a Noble-man and a mighty, beganne not by warre, but by law to challenge the Crowne; putting his claime into the Parliament; where his cauſe was (either for right or fauour) ſo farre forth aduanced that King Henries bloud (albeit hee had a goodly Prince) was vtterly reiected, the Crowne by the authority of that high Court intailed to the Duke of Yorke, and his iſſue male in remainder, immediately after the death of King Henrie. But the Duke not induring ſo long to tarrie, intending vnder pretext of diſſention and debate ariſing in the Realme, to preuent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in King Henries life, was with many other Nobles ſlaine at Wakefield, leauing three ſonnes, Edward, George, and Richard; all of them as they were great ſtates of birth, ſo were they great and ſtately of ſtomacke, greedy and ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners.

(4) For Edward reuenging his fathers death depriued King Henry, and attained the Crowne; The ſecond, George Duke of Clarence, was a goodly Noble Prince, and in all things fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not ſet him againſt his brother, or the enuy of his enemies, his brother againſt him. For were it by the Queene and Lords of her bloud, which highly maligned the kings kindred (as women commonly, not of malice but of nature hate them whom their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himſelfe, intending to be King: at leaſt-wiſe hainous treaſon was laid to his charge, and finally were he faulty, were he faultleſſe, attainted he was by Parliament, and iudged to death, as we haue ſaid.

The deſcription of Richard Duke of Glouceſter.

(5) Richard the third ſonne, of whom we now entreat, was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in body and proweſſe farre vnder them both, little of ſtature, ill-limmed, and crook backed, his left ſhoulder much higher then his right, very hard fauoured of viſage, and ſuch as in States is called warly, in other men otherwiſe: he was malicious, wrathfull, and enuious, yea, and from afore his birth euer froward. For it is for truth reported, that the Dutcheſſe his Mother had ſo much adoe in her trauaile, that ſhe could not be deliuered of him vncut, and that he came into the world with his feet forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the fame runneth) alſo not vntoothed; Whether men of hatred report aboue the truth, or elſe that nature changed her courſe in his beginning, which in the courſe of his life many things vnnaturally committed.

(6) No euill Captaine was he in the warre, as to which his diſpoſition was more inclined then for peace; ſundry victories he had, and ſometimes ouerthrowes, but neuer in default as for his owne perſon, either of hardineſſe, or politicke order; free was he of his diſpence, and ſomewhat aboue his power liberall: with large gifts hee gat him vnſtedfaſt friendſhip, for which he was forced to pill and pole in other places, which gat him ſtedfaſt hatred. Hee was cloſe and ſecret, a deepe diſſembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar where euen now hee hated, and not letting to kiſſe whom hee thought to kill: deſpitefull and cruell he was, not for euill-will alwayes, but oftner for ambition, and either for the ſurety or increaſe of his eſtate. Friend and foe was much-what indifferent; where his aduantage grew, he ſpared no mans death, whoſe life withſtood his purpoſe. He ſlew with his owne hands, King Henrie the ſixth, being Priſoner in the Tower, as men conſtantly ſaid, and that without commandement or knowledge of the King, who vndoubtedly if he had intended his death, would haue appoynted that butcherly office to ſome other then his owne brother.

(7) Some wiſe men alſo iudge, that his driſt couertly conueyed, lacked not in helping forth his brother Clarence to his death; which he reſiſted openly, howbeit ſomewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, then he that was hartily minded to his wealth: And they that thus iudge, thinke that long time in K. Edwards life, he fore-caſt to be King, in caſe that his brother (whoſe life he looked that euill diet ſhould ſhorten) ſhould happen to deceaſe (as indeed hee did) while his children were young. And they deeme that for this intent he was glad of the Duke of Clarence death, whoſe life muſt needes haue hindered him ſo intending, (being his elder brother) whether the ſame Duke had kept him true to his Nephew the young King, or enterprized to be king himſelfe. But of all this poynt there is no certainty, and who ſo diuineth vpon coniectures, may aſwell ſhoote too farre as too ſhort. Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that in the ſame night in which king Edward dyed, one Miſtlebroke (long ere morning) came in great haſte to the houſe of one Pottier dwelling in Red-Croſſe ſtreet without Creeple-gate in London: and when he with haſty rapping, quickly was let in, he ſhewed vnto Pottier that K. Edward was departed. By my troth man quoth Pottier, then will my maſter the Duke of Gloceſter be king: What cauſe he had ſo to thinke, hard it is to ſay, whether being toward him knew any ſuch thing intended, or otherwiſe had any inkling thereof, for it was not likely that he ſpake it of no ground.

He was the cauſe of Clarences his death.

Richard of Glouceſter intended to be king euen whiles K. Edward liued.

The ſpeech of Pottier at King Edwards death.

(8) But now to returne to the courſe of this Hiſtory; were it that the Duke of Gloceſter had of old fore-minded this concluſion, and was now thereunto moued, and put in hope by the occaſion of the tender age of the yong Princes his Nephewes (as opportunity & likelyhood of ſpeed putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certaine it is, that hee contriued their deſtruction, with the vſurpation of the regall dignity vpon himſelfe, and foraſmuch as hee well wiſt, and holp to maintaine a long continued grudge and heart-burning betweene the Queenes kindred, and the Kings bloud, either part enuying others authority; hee now thought their diuiſions ſhould be (as it was indeed) a forward beginning to the purſuite of his intent, and a ſure ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might firſt, vnder the pretext of reuenging olde diſpleaſure, abuſe the anger and ignorance of the one party, to the deſtruction of the other, and then winne to his purpoſe as many as he could, and thoſe that could not be wonne, might be loſt before they were aware; for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were perceiued, he ſhould ſoon haue made peace betweene both the parties with his owne bloud.

Richards deepe pollicy.

(9) King Edward in his life, albeit that this diſſention betweene his friends ſomewhat grieued him, yet in his good health hee ſomewhat leſſe regarded it, becauſe hee thought whatſoeuer buſineſſe ſhould fall betweene them, himſelfe ſhould alwaies bee able to rule both the parties. But in his laſt ſickneſſe, when hee perceiued his naturall ſtrength ſo ſore infeebled, that he diſpaired all recouery; then conſidering the youth of his Children, albeit he nothing leſſe miſtruſted then that that happened, yet well-fore-ſeeing how many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his Children ſhould lacke diſcretion of themſelues, and good Counſell of their friends, of which either partie ſhould counſell for their owne commodity, and the rather by pleaſant aduiſe to winne themſelues fauour, then by profitable aduertiſements to doe his Children good, hee called ſome of them before him that were at variance, and in ſpeciall the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet, the Queenes Sonne by her firſt Husband, and William Lord Haſtings a Nobleman, then Lord Chamberlain, againſt whom the Queene eſpecially grudged, for the great fauour the King bare him: and alſo for that ſhee thought him ſecretly familiar with the King in wanton company. Her kindred alſo bare him ſore, aſwell for that the King had made him Captaine of Callis, which office the Lord Riuers, brother to the Queene

King Edwards care to ſet peace betwixt the Queenes kindred and his.

The Queenes iealouſie againſt the Lord Chamberlaine.

Queene claimed of the Kings former promiſe, as for diuers other great gifts which hee receiued, that they looked for. Theſe were the grudges which the King on his death-bed ſought to remoue, and they in ſhew ſeemed to cancell, as we haue ſaid, though the ſparks of theſe diſpleaſures burſt afterward into a dangerous flame, which conſumed moſt of them, as afterward ſhall appeare.

King Edward repaireth towards London.

(10) For aſſoone as the King was departed this life, his Sonne Prince Edward drew towards London from Ludlow in Wales, which Countrey being farre off from the law, and recourſe to iuſtice, was become to be farre out of Order, and growne wilde; Robbers, Rouers, walking at liberty vncorrected: for which cauſe this Prince in the life time of his Father was ſent thither, to the end that the authority of his preſence ſhould refraine euill-diſpoſed perſons, from the boldneſſe of their former outrages. To the gouernance and ordering of this young Prince at his ſending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthony Wooduill Lord Riuers, brother vnto the Queene, a right honourable man, as valiant of hand as politick in Counſell; adioyned were there vnto him others of the ſame party, and in effect euery one as he was neereſt of kin vnto the Queene, ſo was he planted next about the Prince.

The Queenes kindred onely about the Prince.

(11) That drift of the Queene, not vnwiſely deuiſed, whereby her bloud might of youth be rooted in the Princes fauour, the Duke of Glouceſter turned vnto their deſtruction, and vpon that ground ſet the foundation of all his vnhappy fabricke. For whomſoeuer hee perceiued either at variance with them, or bearing himſelfe, their fauour, he brake vnto them; ſome by mouth, ſome by writing and ſecret meſſengers, that it was neither reaſon, nor in any wiſe to be ſuffered, that the young King their Maſter and kinſeman, ſhould be in the hands and Cuſtody of his mothers kindred, ſequeſtred in manner from their Company and attendance, of which euery one ought him as faithfull ſeruice as they, and many of them farre more honourable part of kin then his mothers ſide: whoſe bloud (quoth he) ſauing the Kings pleaſure, was farre vnmeet to bee matched with his, which now to be as who ſay remoued from the king, and the leſſe noble to be left about him, is (quoth hee) neither honourable to his Maieſtie nor vnto vs, and alſo to his Grace no ſurety, to haue the mightieſt of his friends from him, and vnto vs no little ieopardy, to ſuffer our well-proued euill-willers to grow in ouer-great authoritie with the Prince in youth, who is light of beliefe and ſoone perſwaded. Ye remember I trow, K. Edward himſelfe, albeit he was a man of age and diſcretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, more then ſtood either with his honour, or our profit, or with the commodity of any man elſe, except onely the immoderate aduancement of themſelues. Which whether they ſorer thirſted after their owne weale, or our woe, it were hard I weene to geſſe, and if ſome folkes friendſhip had not held better place with the King, then any reſpect of kindred, they might perhaps eaſily haue intrapped and brought ſome of vs to confuſion ere this; why not as eaſily as they haue done ſome other already, as neere of his royall bloud as we? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and thankes be to his grace, that perill is paſt: howbeit as great is growing, if we ſuffer this young King in our enemies hand; which without his knowledge might abuſe the name of his commandement, to any of our vndoing, which thing God and good prouiſion forbid.

The Duke ſeeketh to diſplace the Prince.

The crafty complaints of Richard Duke of Glouceſter.

(12) Of which good prouiſion none of vs hath any thing the leſſe neede, for the late made attonement, in which the Kings pleaſure had more place then the parties wils: nor none of vs, I beleeue, is ſo vnwiſe ouer-ſoone to truſt a new friend made of an old foe, or to thinke that an hourely kindnes, ſodainly contracted in one houre, continued yet ſcarce a fortnight, ſhould be deeper ſetled in their ſtomackes, then a long accuſtomed malice many yeares rooted. With theſe word and writings and ſuch other, the Duke of Glouceſter ſoone ſet a fire them that were of themſelues apt enough to kindle, eſpecially two, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Haſtings Chamberlaine, both men of honor, and of great power. The one by long ſucceſſion from his Auncеſtry: the other by his office, and the Kings fauour. Theſe two not bearing each to other ſo much loue, as both of them hatred vnto the Queenes part, in this point accorded together, with the Duke of Glouceſter, that they would vtterly remoue from the Kings Company all his mothers friends vnder the name of their enemies.

The concluſion of his deſignes.

(13) Vpon this concluſion the Duke of Glouceſter vnderſtanding that the Lords, which at that time were about the King, intended to bring him to London to his Coronation, accompanied with ſuch power of their friends, that it ſhould be hard for him to bring his purpoſe to paſſe, without the gathering a great aſſembly of people, and in manner of open warre, whereof the end he wiſt well was doubtfull, and in which the King being on their ſide, his part ſhould haue the face and name of a Rebellion; he ſecretly therefore, by diuers meanes, cauſed the Queene to be perſwaded and brought in mind, that it neither were need, and alſo ſhould be ieopardous, the King to come vp ſtrong.

Another crafty pollicy of Duke Richard.

(14) For whereas now euery Lord loued other, and no other thing ſtudied vpon but about the Coronation and honour of the King: if the Lords of her kindred ſhould aſſemble in the Kings name much people, they ſhould giue the Lords of the contrary faction cauſe to feare and ſuſpect, leſt they ſhould gather this people, not for the Kings ſafegard, whom no man impugned, but for their deſtruction, hauing more regard to their olde variance, then their new attonement: for which cauſe they ſhould aſſemble on the other party much people againe for their defence, whoſe power ſhe wiſt well ſtretched farre: and thus ſhould all the Realme fall on an vproare: and of all the hurt that thereof ſhould enſue, which was likely not to be a little, and the moſt harme like to fall where ſhe leaſt would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the blame, and ſay that they had vnwiſely and vntruly alſo broken the amity & peace which the King her husband ſo prudently made betwixt his kin and hers on his death-bed, and which the other party faithfully obſerued.

The Queene yeeldeth to the Dukes perſwaſion.

(15) The Queene in this wiſe perſwaded, ſent ſuch word vnto her ſonne; and vnto her brother, being about the King: beſides, the Duke of Glouceſter himſelfe, and other Lords, the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the King ſo reuerently, and to the Queenes friends there ſo louingly, that they nothing earthly miſtruſting, brought vp the King in great haſt, but not in good ſpeed, with a ſober company. Now was the King in his way to London, gone from Northampton, when the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham came thither, where remained behinde, the Lord Riuers the Kings vncle, intending on the morrow to follow the King, and be with him at Stony-Stratford, twelue miles thence, earely ere he departed. So was there made that night much friendly cheare betwixt theſe two Dukes and the Lord Riuers a great while: but incontinent after that, they were openly with great curteſie departed, and the Lord Riuers lodged, the Dukes ſecretly with a few of their moſt priuy friends, ſet them downe in Councell, wherein they ſpent a great part of the night: and at their riſing, in the dawning of the day, they ſent out priuily to their ſeruants in their Innes and lodgings about, giuing command to make themſelues ſhortly ready, for their Lords were to horſe-ward: vpon which meſſages, many of their folke were attendant, when many of the L. Riuers ſeruants were vnready.

The Lords meet at Northampton.

(16) Now had theſe Dukes taken into their cuſtodies the keyes of the Inne, that none ſhould paſſe forth without their licenſe: and beſides this, in the high high-way towards Stony-Stratford, where the King lay, they had beſtowed certaine of their men, that ſhould ſend backe againe, and compell to returne any man that were gotten out of Northampton towards Stony-Stratford, till they had further order: foraſmuch as the Dukes themſelues intended, for the ſhew of their diligence, to bee the firſt that ſhould that day attend vpon the Kings Highneſſe out of that Towne. Thus bare they folke in hand: but when the Lord Riuers vnderſtood the gates cloſed, the wayes beſet, neither his ſeruants, or himſelfe ſuffered to goe out, conſidering well ſo great a thing without his knowledge, could not bee done for nought; and comparing this preſent manner with his laſt nights cheare, in ſo few houres to haue ſo great a change, maruailouſly miſliked it. Howbeit, ſith hee could not get away, nor keepe himſelfe cloſe, hee would not, leſt hee ſhould ſeeme to hide himſelfe for ſome ſecret feare of his own fault, wherof hee ſaw no ſuch cauſe in himſelfe: hee determined vpon the ſurety of his owne conſcience, to goe boldly vnto them, and to enquire what this matter might meane; whom as ſoone as they ſaw, they beganne to quarrell with, ſaying, that hee entended to ſet diſtance betweene the King and them, and to bring them to confuſion, but it ſhould not lie in his power. And when he began (as he was a very well ſpoken man) in ſeemely wiſe to excuſe himſelfe, they tarried not the end of his anſwere, but ſhortly tooke him, and put him in ward: and that done, forthwith went to horſe-backe, and tooke the way to Stony-Stratford, where they found the King with his Company, ready to leape on horſe-backe, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, becauſe it was too ſtrait for both companies.

The Lord Riuers impriſoned in Northampton.

(17) And as ſoone as they came in his preſence, they alighted downe with all their company about them; to whom the Duke of Buckingham ſaid, Goe afore Gentlemen, and Yeomen keepe your roomes. In which goodly array they came to the King, and on their knees in very humble manner ſaluted his Grace, who receiued them in very ioyous and amiable manner, nothing knowing, nor miſtruſting as yet what was done. But euen by and by in his preſence, they picked a quarrell to the Lord Gray, the Kings other brother by his mother, ſaying, that he with the Lord Marqueſſe his brother, and the Lord Riuers his Vncle, had compaſſed to rule the King & the realme, and to ſet variance among the States, and to ſubdue and deſtroy the noble bloud of the Realme: towards the accompliſhing whereof, they ſaid that the Lord Marqueſſe had entred into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the Kings Treaſure, and had ſent men to the ſea: All which things theſe Dukes well knew were done for neceſſary and good purpoſes, by the whole Councell at London, ſauing that ſomewhat they muſt ſay.

The Dukes come to the King.

A quarrell picked in the Kings preſence.

Accuſations againſt the Queens kindred.

(18) Vnto which words the King anſwered, what my brother Marqueſſe hath done I cannot ſay: but in good ſooth I dare well anſwere for mine Vncle Riuers, and my brother here, that they are innocent of any ſuch matter: yea my Liege, quoth the Duke of Buckingham, they haue kept the dealings of theſe matters farre from the knowledge of your good Grace. And forthwith they arreſted the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hawt knights, in the Kings preſence, and brought the King and all his company backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counſell. And there they ſent away from the King whom it pleaſed them, and ſet new ſeruants about him, ſuch as better liked them then him: At which dealing the King wept, and was nothing content; but it booted not: and at dinner the Duke of Gloceſter ſent a diſh from his owne Table to the Lord Riuers, bidding him be of good cheere, for all ſhould be well. But the Lord Riuers thanking the Duke, prayed the Meſſenger to beare it to the Lord Richard, with the ſame meſſage for his comfort, as one to whom ſuch aduerſity was ſtrange, but himſelfe had beene all his dayes inured therewith, and therefore could beare it the better: but for all this comfortable courteſie of the Duke of Gloucester, he ſent the Lord Riuers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan, into the North Country, into diuers places to priſon, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in concluſion beheaded.

The King is brought backe to Northampton.

The Duke of Glouceſter ſends a diſh of meat vnto the Lord Riuers.

The Lord Riuers and others beheaded.

(19) In this wiſe the Duke of Gloceſter tooke vpon himſelfe the Order and Gouernance of the young King, whom with much honour and humble reuerence hee conuaied towards London. But anone the tydings of this matter came haſtily to the Queene, a little before the midnight following, and that in the foreſt wiſe, that the King her Sonne was taken, her Brother, her Sonne, and other friends arreſted, and ſent no man wiſt whither, to be done with God wot what. With which tidings, the Queene in great fright and heauineſſe, bewailed her childes raigne, her friends miſchance, and her owne misfortune, damning the time that euer ſhe diſſwaded the gathering of power about the King, got her ſelfe in all haſt poſſible with her yong ſonne, & her daughters, out of the Palace of Weſtminſter, in which ſhe then lay, into the Sanctuary, lodging her ſelfe and company there in the Abbots place.

Queene Elizabeth taketh Sanctuary.

(20) Now came there one likewiſe, not long after night from the Lord Chamberlaine, vnto the Archbiſhop of Yorke then Chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Weſtminſter; and for that he ſhewed his ſeruants, that hee had tidings of great importance, that his M. gaue him in charge, not to forbeare his reſt, they letted not to awake him; nor hee to admit the Meſſenger vnto his bed-ſide. Of whom hee heard that theſe Dukes were gone backe with the Kings Grace from Stony-Stratford vnto Northampton: notwithſtanding Sir (quoth he) my Lord ſendeth your Lordſhip word, that there is no feare: for hee aſſureth you that all ſhall bee well. I aſſure him (quoth the Archbiſhop) bee it as well as it will, it will neuer bee ſo well as we haue ſeene it. And thereupon by and by after the meſſengers departure, hee cauſed in all haſt all his ſeruants to be called vp, and ſo with his owne houſehold about him, euery man weaponed, hee tooke the Great Seale with him, and came yet before day vnto the Queene. About whom hee found much heauineſſe, rumble, haſte and buſineſſe, carriage and conueiance of her ſtuffe into Sanctuary, cheſts, coffers, packes and fardels, truſſed all on mens backes, no man vn-occupied, ſome lading, ſome going, ſome diſcharging, ſome comming for more, ſome breaking downe the wals to bring in the next way, and ſome drew to them to helpe to carry a wrong way. The Queene her ſelfe ſate alone alow on the ruſhes, all deſolate and diſmayed, whom the Archbiſhop comforted in the beſt manner he could, ſhewing her that he truſted the matter was nothing ſo ſore as ſhe tooke it for, and that hee was put in good hope and out of feare, by a meſſage ſent him from the Lord Chamberlaine: Ah woe worth him (quoth the Queene) hee is one of them that laboureth to deſtroy me and my bloud.

The Lord Chamberlaine ſendeth the newes to the L. Chancellor.

The Archbiſhops comforts to the Queene.

(21) Madam (quoth hee) bee of good cheare; for I aſſure you, if they crowne any other King then your ſonne, whom they haue now with them, we ſhal on the morrow crowne his brother, whom you haue here with you: and here is the Great Seale, which in like ſort as that noble Prince your Husband deliuered it vnto mee, ſo here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vſe and behoofe of your Sonne, and therewith hee betooke her the Great Seale, and departed home againe, euen in the dawning of the day: by which time hee might in his Chamber window ſee all the Thames full of boats of the Dukes of Gloceſters ſeruants, watching that no man ſhould goe to Sanctuary, nor none ſhould paſſe vnſearched. Then was there great commotion and murmure, aſwell in other places about, as eſpecially in the City, the people diuerſly diuerſly diuining vpon this dealing. And ſome Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, either for fauour of the Queene, or for feare of themſelues, aſſembled in ſundry Companies, and went flocke-meale in harneſſe: and many alſo, for that they accounted this demeanour attempted, not ſo ſpecially againſt the other Lords, as againſt the King himſelfe in the diſturbance of his Coronation.

Great feare conceiued of the ouermuch murmuring made.

(22) But then, by and by the Lords aſſembled together, towards which meeting, the Archbiſhoppe of Yorke fearing that it would bee aſcribed (as it was indeed) to his ouermuch lightneſſe, that hee ſo ſodainely had yeelded vp the great Seale to the Queene (to whom the cuſtody thereof nothing appertained) without ſpeciall commandement of the King, ſecretly ſent for the Seale againe, and brought it with him after the accuſtomed manner. And at this meeting the Lord Haſtings, whoſe truth toward the King no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perſwaded the Lords to beleeue, that the Duke of Glouceſter was ſure and faſtly faithfull to his Prince, and that the Lord Riuers, and Lord Richard, with the other Knight, were for matters attempted by them againſt the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham put vnder arreſt for their ſurety, not for the Kings ieopardy; and that they were alſo in ſafeguard, and there no longer ſhould remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes onely, but alſo by all the other Lords of the Kings Councell indifferently examined, and by other diſcretions ordered, either iudged or appeaſed. But one thing he aduiſed them beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their priuate grudges into the common hurt, irking and prouoking men vnto anger; and diſturbing the kings Coronation; towards which the Dukes were comming vp, that they might peraduenture bring the matter ſo farre out of ioynt, that it ſhould neuer be brought in frame againe. Which ſtrife if it ſhould happen (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all things equall, yet ſhould the authority be on that ſide where the King is himſelfe.

Perſwaſions of the L. Haſtings that nothing was extreamly meant.

(23) With theſe perſwaſions of the Lord Haſtings, whereof part himſelfe beleeued, of part he wiſt the contrary, theſe commotions were ſomewhat appeaſed, but eſpecially by that, that the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham were ſo neere, and came ſo ſhortly on with the King, in none other manner, with none other voice, or any other ſemblance then to his Coronation; cauſing the fame to be blowne about, that theſe Lords and Knights which were taken, had contriued the deſtruction of the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, and of other the Noble bloud of the Realme, to the end that themſelues would alone demeane and gouerne the King at their pleaſure. And for the colourable proofe thereof, ſuch of the Dukes ſeruants as rode with the Carts of their ſtuffe that were taken (amongſt which ſtuffe no maruell though ſome were harneſſe, which at the breaking vp of the houſhold, muſt needs either be brought away, or caſt away) they ſhewed vnto the people all the way as they went; ſaying, loe here be the barrels of harneſſe, that theſe Traitours haue priuily conuaied in their Carriages to deſtroy the Noble Lords withall. This deuiſe, albeit it made the matter to wiſemen more vnlikely, well perceiuing that the intenders of ſuch a purpoſe would rather haue had their harneſſe on their backes, then to bee bound vp in barrels: yet much part of the common people were therewith very well ſatisfied, and ſaid it were almes to hang them.

Falſe imputation caſt vpon the Lords of the Queenes bloud.

How ſoone the Commons are brought into fooles Paradiſe.

(24) When the King approached neere to the City, Edmund Shaa Goldſmith, then Maior, with William White, and Iohn Matthew Sheriffes, and all the other Aldermen in Scarlet, with fiue hundred horſe of the Citizens, in Violet, receiued him reuerently at Harneſey, and riding from thence, accompanied him into the City, which he entred the fourth day of May, the firſt and laſt yeare of his raigne. The King was lodged in the Biſhops Pallace, where was kept a great Councell, and there was ſworne to the King the Duke of Glouceſter, the Duke of Buckingham, and all the Lords. But the Duke of Gloceſter bare him in open ſight ſo reuerently to the Prince, with all ſemblance of lowlineſſe, that from the great obloquie in which he was ſo late before, hee was ſodainly ſalne in ſo great truſt, that at the Councell next aſſembled, he was made the onely man, choſen and thought moſt meet to be Protector of the King and his Realme, ſo that (were it deſtiny, or were it folly) the Lambe was betaken to the Wolfe to keepe. At which Councell alſo, the Archbiſhop of Yorke, Chancellor of England, which had deliuered vp the great Seale to the Queene, was thereof greatly reproued, and the Seale taken from him, & deliuered to Doctor Ruſſell Biſhop of Lincolne, a wiſe man, and of much experience, and vndoubtedly one of the beſt learned men that England had in his time: diuers Lords and Knights were appointed vnto diuers Roomes, the Lord Chamberlaine, and ſome others, keeping ſtill their Offices they had before.

The great Seale is taken from the Archbiſhop of Yorke.

(25) Now although that the Protector ſo ſore thirſted for the finiſhing of thoſe deſignes which he had begun, and thought euery day a yeare till they were atchieued, yet durſt he no further attempt, ſo long as hee had but halfe his prey in his hand: well witting, that if hee depoſed the one Brother, all the Realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in Sanctuary, or ſhould be conueyed to his further liberty: wherefore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords in Councell, he propoſed vnto them, that it was a hainous deed of the Queene, and proceeded of great malice towards the Kings Counſellers, that ſhe ſhould keepe in Sanctuary the Kings Brother from him, whoſe ſpeciall pleaſure and comfort were to haue his Brother with him: and that by her done, was to none other intent, but to bring all the Lords in obloquie, and murmure of the people, as though they were not to be truſted with the Kings Brother, who by aſſent of the Nobles of the land, were appointed as the Kings neereſt friends, to the tuition of his owne royall perſon. The proſperity whereof ſtandeth (quoth hee) not all in keeping from enemies or ill viand, but partly alſo in recreation, and moderate pleaſure, which he in his tender youth cannot take in the company of ancient perſons, but in the familiar conuerſation of thoſe that be neither farre vnder, nor farre aboue his age, and neuertheleſſe of eſtate conuenient to accompany his noble Maieſty; wherefore with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if any man thinke this conſideration (which I thinke no man thinketh that loueth the King) let him conſider that ſometimes without ſmall things, greater cannot ſtand. And verily, it redoundeth greatly to the diſhonour both of the Kings Highneſſe, and of vs all that are about his Grace, to haue it runne in euery mans mouth, not in this Realme onely, but alſo in other lands, (as euill words walke farre) that the Kings brother ſhall be faine to keepe Sanctuary; for euery man I deeme, will ſuppoſe, that there is occaſion giuen, why it ſhould ſo be: and ſuch euill opinions once faſtened in mens hearts, hardly can be ſcrewed out againe, and may grow to more griefe then any man here can diuine. Wherefore I thinke it were not the worſt to ſend vnto the Queene for the redreſſe of this matter, ſome honourable truſty man, ſuch as both tendreth the Kings weale, and the honour of this Councell, and is alſo in fauour and credence with her. For all which conſiderations, none ſeemeth to mee more meete, then is our reuerend Father here preſent, my Lord Cardinall, who may in this matter doe moſt good of any man, if it pleaſe him to take the paines, which I doubt not of his goodneſſe hee will not refuſe, for the Kings ſake and ours, and weale of the young Duke himſelfe, the Kings moſt honourable brother,

The Protectors perſwaſion to take out of Sanctuary the young Duke of Yorke.

A fine fetch to fetch out the Duke.

The Protector would haue the Queene ſent vnto.

King Edward met by the Citizens, and accompanied by them into London.

and after my Soueraigne himselfe, my most deere Nephew, considering that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumour and obloquie now going, and the hurts auoided that thereof might ensue, & much rest and quiet grow to all the Realme. And if she be percase so obstinate, and so precisely set vpon her owne will, that neither his wise and faithfull aduertisement cannot moue her, nor any mans reason content her: then shall we by mine aduise, and by the Kings authority, fetch him out of that Prison, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose continuall company he shall be so well cherished, and so honourably intreated, that all the world shall to our honor, and her reproach perceiue, that it was onely malice, frowardnesse, or folly, that caused her to keepe him there: this is my minde in this matter for this time, except any of your Lordships any thing perceiue to the contrary, for neuer shall I by Gods grace, so wed my selfe to my owne will, but that I shall be ready to change it vpon your better aduises.

If the Queene refuse to deliuer the Duke what is to be done.

(26) When the Protector had said, all the Councell affirmed, that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the King and the Duke his Brother honourable, and the thing that should cease great murmure in the Realme, if the mother might be by good meanes induced to deliuer him. Which thing the Archbishop of Yorke, whom they all agreed also to be thereto most conuenient, tooke vpon him to moue her, and therein to doe his vttermost endeauour: howbeit, if she could by no meanes be entreated with her good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and such other of the Clergie then present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted, to take him out against her will. For it would be a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuiledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many yeares beene kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more then fiue hundred yeares agoe, by S. Peter in his owne person, in spirit accompanied with great multitude of Angels, by night so specially hallowed and dedicated to God, (for the proofe whereof, they haue yet in the Abbey, Saint Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer so vndeuout a King, that durst violate that sacred place, or so holy a Bishop, that durst presume to consecrate it; and therefore (quoth the Archbishop of Yorke) God forbid that any man should for any thing earthly, enterprize to breake the immunitie and liberty of that sacred Sanctuarie, that hath beene the safegard of many a good mans life: and I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace we shall not need it. But for what need soeuer, I would not we should doe it; I trust that she shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner obtained; but if it happen that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it with my best, and you shall all well perceiue, that there shall be of my indeauour no lacke, if the Mothers dread, and womanish feare be not the let.

All the Counsell allow of the Protectors speech.

A great offence to breake the Sanctuary.

S. Peters owne Cope was to be seene in Westminster.

(27) Womanish feare, nay womanish frowardnesse (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule she well knoweth there is no need of any feare, either for her sonne, or for her selfe. For as for her, here is no man that will be at warre with a woman: Would God some of the men of her kin were women too, and then should all be soone in rest: Howbeit, there is none of her kin the lesse loued, for that they be of her kin, but for their owne euill-deseruing. And nay the lesse, if we loued neither her, nor her kinne, yet were there no cause to thinke that we should hate the Kings noble Brother, to whose Grace we our selues be of kin: whose honour, if she as much desired, as our dishonour, and as much regard tooke to his wealth, as to her owne will, she would be as loth to suffer him from the King, as any of vs be. For, if she haue wit, (as would God she had as good will as she hath shrewd wit) she reckoneth her selfe no wiser, then she thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull minde she nothing doubteth, but verily beleeueth and knoweth, that they would be as sorry of his harme, as her selfe, and yet would haue him from her, if she bide there: and we all (I thinke) content, that both be with her, if she come thence, and bide in such place, where they may be with their honour. Now then, if she refuse in the deliuerance of him, to follow the counsell of them, whose wisedome she knoweth, whose truth she well trusteth: it is easie to perceiue, that frowardnesse letteth her, and not feare. But goe to, suppose that she feare, (as who may let her to feare her owne shadow?) the more she feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we to feare to leaue him in her hands: For, if she cast such fond doubts, that she feare his hurt; then will shee feare that hee shall be fetcht thence. For she will soone thinke, that if men were set (which God forbid) vpon so great a mischiefe, the Sanctuary would little let them: which good men might (as I thinke) without sin, somewhat lesse regard then they doe. Then, if she doubt, lest hee might be fetched from her, is it not likely that she shall send him somewhere out of the Realme? Verily, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but she now as sore mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if she might happen to bring that to passe (as it were no great mastery, we letting her alone) all the world would say, that we were a wise sort of Counsellors about a King, that suffer his Brother to be cast away vnder our noses. And therefore I assure you faithfully for my minde, I will rather, maugre her mind, fetch him away, then leaue him there, till her frowardnesse and fond feare conuay him away. And yet will I breake no Sanctuary therefore: for verily, sith the priuiledges of that place, and other-like haue beene of long continued, I am not he that will goe about to breake them. And in good faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say nay, but that it is a deed of pitty, that such men, as the sea, or their euill debters haue brought in pouerty, should haue some place of libertie, to keepe their bodies out of the danger of their cruell Creditors. And also, if the Crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either part taketh other as Traitours, I like well there be some places of refuge for both. But as for theeues, of which these places be full, and which neuer fall from the craft after they once fall therevnto; it is pittie the Sanctuary should serue them, and much more manquellers, whom God bad to take from the Altar and kill them, if their murther were wilfull. And where it is otherwise, there need wee not the Sanctuaries, that God appointed in the old Law: for if either necessity, his own defence, or misfortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the King of pittie may. Then looke we now how few sanctuary men there be, whom any fauourable necessity compelled to goe thither; and then see on the other side, what a sort there be commonly therein of them, whom wilfull vnthriftinesse hath brought to naught: what rabble of theeues, murtherers, and malicious hainous Traitors, and that in two places especially? the one at the elbow of the Citie, the other in the very bowels. I dare well auow it, weigh the good that they doe, with the hurt that commeth of them, and yee shall finde it much better to lacke both, then to haue both. And this I say, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long haue been, that I feare me euer they will be, while men be afraide to set the hands to amend them, as though God and S. Peter were the patrons of vngracious liuing. Now vnthrifts riot, and runne in debt, vpon the boldnesse of these places; yea, and rich men runne thither with poore mens goods, there they build, there they spend, and bid their Creditors goe whistle. Mens wiues runne thither with their husbands plate, and say, ſay, they dare not abide with their Husbands for beating. Theeues bring thither their ſtolne goods, and liue thereon riotouſly: there they deuiſe new robberies, nightly they ſteale out, they robbe and riue, kill and come in againe, as though thoſe places gaue them not onely a ſafe-guard for the harme they haue done, but a licenſe alſo to doe more; howbeit much of this miſchiefe, if Wiſemen would ſet their hands to it, might be amended, with great thankes of God, and no breach of the Priuiledge. The reſidue, ſith ſo long agoe, I wot neere what Pope, and what Prince more pitteous then politique hath granted it, and other men ſince, of a certaine religious feare, haue not broken it; Let vs therefore take paine therewith, and let it a Gods name ſtand in force, as farre forth as reaſon will, which is not fully ſo farre forth, as may ſerue to let vs of the fetching forth of this Nobleman, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can be a Sanctuary man. A Sanctuary ſerueth alwayes to defend the body of that man that ſtandeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onely, but alſo of lawfull hurt; for againſt vnlawfull harmes, neuer Pope nor King intended to Priuiledge any one place, for that Priuiledge hath euery place: knoweth any man any place, wherein it is lawfull for one man to doe another wrong? that no man vnlawfully take hurt, that libertie, the King, the Law, and very nature forbiddeth in euery place, and maketh to that regard, for euery man, euery place a Sanctuary: but where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth he the tuition of ſome ſpeciall priuiledge, which is the onely ground and cauſe of all Sanctuaries: from which neceſſitie this noble Prince is farre, whoſe loue to the King, nature and kindred proueth, whoſe innocency to all the World, his tender youth proueth, and ſo Sanctuary, as for him, neyther none he needeth, nor none can he haue. Men come not to Sanctuary, as they come to Baptiſme, to require it by their God-fathers; he muſt aske it himſelfe, that muſt haue it; and reaſon, ſith no man hath cauſe to haue it, but whoſe conſcience of his owne fault maketh him faine need to require it: what will then hath yonder Babe? which and if he had diſcretion to require it, if neede were, I dare ſay would now be right angry with them that keepe him there: and I would thinke without any ſcruple of conſcience, without any breach of Priuiledge, to be ſomewhat more homely with them, that be there Sanctuary-men indeed: for if one goe to Sanctuary with another mans goods, why ſhould not the King, leauing his body at libertie, ſatisfie the party of his goods, euen within the Sanctuary? for neyther King nor Pope can giue any place ſuch a priuiledge, that it ſhall diſcharge a man of his debts, being able to pay. And with that diuers of the Clergy that were preſent, whether they ſaid it for his pleaſure, or as they thought, agreed plainely, that by the law of GOD, and of the Church, the goods of a Sanctuary-man, ſhould be deliuered in payment of his debts, and ſtolne goods to the owner, and onely liberty reſerued him, to get his liuing with the labour of his hands. Verily (quoth the Duke) I thinke you ſay very truth; and what if a mans wife would take Sanctuary, becauſe ſhe liſt to runne from her Husband? I would weene if ſhe could alledge none other cauſe, he may lawfully without any diſpleaſure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters Church by the arme. And if no body may be taken out of Sanctuary, that ſaith he will bide there then if a childe will take Sanctuary, becauſe he feareth to goe to Schoole, his Maſter muſt let him alone. And as ſimple as the ſample is, yet is there leſſe reaſon in our caſe then in that; for therein, though it be a childiſh feare; yet is there at the leaſt wiſe ſome feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I haue often heard of Sanctuary-men, but I neuer heard earſt of Sanctuary Children. And therefore, as for the Concluſion of my minde, who ſo may haue deſerued to neede it, if they thinke it for their ſuretie, let them keepe it; but he can be no Sanctuary-man that had neither wiſdome to deſire it, nor malice to deſerue it, whoſe life or libertie, can by no lawfull proceſſe ſtand in jeopardie: and he that taketh one out of the Sanctuary to doe him good, I ſay plainely that he breaketh no Sanctuary.

Buckingham's concluſion.

(28) When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholly, and moſt part of the ſpirituall alſo, thinking no hurt earthly meant towards the young Babe, condiſcended in effect, that if he were not deliuered, he ſhould be fetched; howbeit they all thought it beſt, in the auoyding of all manner of rumour, that the Lord Cardinall ſhould firſt aſſay to get him with her good will. And thereupon, all the Councell came vnto the Starre-Chamber at Weſtminſter, and the Lord Cardinall leauing the Protector with the Councell in the Starre-Chamber, departed into the Sanctuary to the Queene with diuers other Lords with him, were it for the reſpect of his honour, or that ſhe ſhould by preſence of ſo many perceiue that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this matter to truſt any one man alone, or elſe, that if ſhe finally were determined to keepe him, ſome of that Company had happily ſecret inſtructions, incontinent, maugre her mind to take him, and to leaue her no reſpite to conuey him, which ſhe was likely to minde, after this matter broken to her, if the time would in any wiſe ſerue her.

The generall conſent of them all.

(29) When the Queene and thoſe Lords were come together in preſence, the Lord Cardinall ſhewed her, that it was thought vnto the Protector, and vnto the whole Councell, that her keeping of the Kings Brother in that place, was the thing which highly ſounded, not onely to the great rumour of the people, and their obloquie, but alſo to the importable griefe and diſpleaſure of the Kings royall Majeſty, to whoſe Grace it were a ſingular comfort, to haue his naturall Brother in Company, as it was both his diſhonour, all theirs, and hers alſo, to ſuffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one Brother ſtood in danger and perill of the other. And he ſhewed her, that the Counſell therefore had ſent him to require her the deliuery of the yong Duke, that he might be brought vnto the Kings preſence at his liberty, out of that place, which they reckoned as a priſon, and there he ſhould be demeaned, according to his eſtate: and ſhe in this doing ſhould both doe great good to the Realme, pleaſure to the Councell, and profit to her ſelfe, ſuccour to her friends that were in diſtreſſe; and beſides that (which he wiſt well ſhe ſpecially tendred) not onely great comfort and honour to the King, but alſo to the young Duke himſelfe, whoſe great wealth it were to be together, aſwell for many greater cauſes, as alſo for both their diſports and recreations; which thing the Lords eſteemed not ſlight; though it ſeemed light; well pondering that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, nor any ſtranger, for the coniecture of both their ages and eſtates, ſo meet in that poynt for any of them, as either of them for other.

The Cardinall doth his errand to the Queene.

(30) My Lord (quoth the Queene) I ſay not nay, but that it were very conuenient, that this Gentleman whom yee require, were in company of the King his Brother; and in good faith, I thinke it were as great commoditie to them both, for yet a while to bee in the cuſtodie of their mother, the tender age conſidered of the elder of them both, but ſpecially the younger, which beſides his Infancie, that alſo needeth good looking to, hath a while beene ſo ſore diſeaſed, vexed with ſickneſſe, and is ſo newly rather a little amended, then well-recouered, that I dare put no perſon earthly in truſt with his keeping but my ſelfe onely, conſidering that there is (as Phyſitians

And albeit there might be found other that would happily doe their beſt vnto him, yet is there none that eyther knoweth better how to order him, then I that ſo long haue kept him, or is more like tenderly to cheriſh him then his owne mother that bare him.

(31) No man denieth, good Madam (quoth the Cardinall) but that your Grace were of all others moſt neceſſary about your Children, and ſo would all the Councell not onely be content, but glad that you were, if it might ſtand with your pleaſure, to be in ſuch place as might ſtand with their honor: but if you doe appoynt your ſelfe to tarry here, then they thinke it were more conuenient that the Duke of Yorke were with the King, honourably at his liberty, to the comfort of them both, rather then here as a Sanctuary man, to both their diſhonour and obloquie, ſith there is not alwaies ſo great a neceſſitie to haue the childe with his mother, but that occaſion may ſometimes be ſuch, that it ſhould be more expedient to keepe him ellewhere, which well appeareth in this, that at ſuch time as your deareſt ſonne then Prince, and now King, ſhould for his honour, and good order of the Country, keepe his reſidence in Wales, farre out of your company, your Grace was well contented therewith your ſelfe.

(32) Not very well contented (quoth the Queen) and yet the caſe is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now ſicke: in which caſe I maruaile greatly, that my Lord Protector is ſo deſirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the Childe in his ſickneſſe miſcarry by nature, yet might he runne into ſlander and ſuſpition of fraud. And where they call it a thing ſo ſore againſt my Childes honour, and theirs alſo, that he abideth in this place: it is all their honours there to ſuffer him abide, where no man doubteth he ſhall be beſt kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth, and jeopard my ſelfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in ſurety with me, then I there in jeopardy with them.

(33) Why Madame (quoth another Lord) know you any thing why they ſhould be in jeopardy? Nay verily (quoth ſhe) nor why they ſhould be in Priſon, as now they be: But it is I trow no great maruaile though I feare, leſt thoſe that haue not letted to put them in durance without colour, will let as little to procure their deſtruction without cauſe. The Cardinall made a countenance to the other Lord, that he ſhould harpe no more vpon that ſtring, and then ſaid he to the Queene, that he nothing doubted, but that thoſe Lords of her honourable Kinne, which as yet remayned vnder arreſt, ſhould vpon the matter examined do well inough, and as towards her noble perſon, neither was, neither could be any jeopardy.

(34) Whereby ſhould I truſt that (quoth the Queene?) in that I am guiltleſſe? as though they were guilty: in that I am with their enemies better loued then they? when they hate them for my ſake; in that I am ſo neere a kinne to the King? and how farre they be off, if that would helpe, as God grant it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpoſe not as yet to depart hence. And as for this Gentleman my ſonne, I minde that he ſhall be where I am, till I ſee further: for I aſſure you, for that I ſee ſome Men ſo greedy, without any ſubſtantiall cauſe to haue him, makes me much more fearefull to deliuer him. Truely Madame (quoth he) the more vnwilling that you be to deliuer him, the more vnwilling other men be to ſuffer you to keepe him, leſt your cauſeleſſe feare might cauſe you farther to conuey him: and many there be that thinke he can haue no priuiledge in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deſerue it; and therefore, they reckon no priuiledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if you finally refuſe to deliuer him, I verily thinke they will: ſo much dread hath my Lord his Vncle, for the tender loue he beareth him, leſt your Grace ſhould hope to ſend him away.

(35) Ah ſir, (quoth the Queene) hath the Protector ſo tender zeale that he feareth nothing, but leſt he ſhould eſcape him? thinketh he that I would ſend him hence, which is not in plight to ſend out, and in what place could I account him ſure, if he be not ſure in the Sanctuary? which there was neuer Tyrant yet ſo diueliſh, that durſt preſume to breake. And I truſt GOD is as ſtrong now to withſtand his aduerſaries, as euer he was. But my ſonne can deſerue no Sanctuary, and therefore he cannot haue it. Forſooth he hath found out a goodly gloſſe, by which that place that may defend a thiefe, may not ſaue an innocent: but he is in no jeopardy, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. Thinketh the Protector, (I pray GOD he may proue a Protector) thinketh he, that I perceiue not whereunto his painted Proceſſe draweth? It is not honorable that the Duke abide here: It were comfortable for them both, that he were with his Brother, becauſe the King lacketh a play-fellow forſooth. I pray God ſend them both better play-fellowes then him, that maketh ſo high a matter, vpon ſo trifling pretext, as though there could none be found to play with the King, but his Brother, (that hath no liſt to play for ſickneſſe) come out of Sanctuary, out of his ſafe-guard to play with him. As though Princes, as young as they be, could not play but with their Peeres, or Children could not play but with their kindred, with whom for the moſt part they agree much worſe then with ſtrangers. But the Child cannot require the Priuiledge: Who told him ſo? he ſhall heare him aske it, if he will. Howbeit, this is a gay matter, ſuppoſe he could not aske it, ſuppoſe he would not aske it, ſuppoſe he would aske to goe out, if I ſay he ſhall not: If I aske the Priuiledge but for my ſelfe, I ſay he that taketh him out againſt my will, breaketh the Sanctuary. Serueth this liberty for my perſon onely, or for my goods alſo: you may not take hence my Horſe from me; and may you take my Childe from me? He alſo is my ward: for as my learned Counſell ſheweth me, ſith he hath nothing by diſcent holden by Knights-ſeruice, the law maketh his mother his Gardian. Then may no man (I ſuppoſe) take my Ward from me out of Sanctuary, without the breach of Sanctuary. And if my Priuiledge could not ſerue him, nor he aske it for himſelfe, yet ſith the Law committeth to me the cuſtody of him, I may require it for him, except the Law giue a childe a Gardian onely for his goods and Lands, diſcharging him of the cure and ſafe-keeping of his body, for which onely both lands and goods ſerue. And if examples be ſufficient, to obtaine Priuiledge for my childe, I need not farre to ſeeke them, for in this place in which now we be (and which is now in queſtion, whether my childe may take benefit of it) mine other ſonne now King, was borne, kept in his Cradle, and preſerued to a more proſperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the firſt time that I haue taken Sanctuary. For when my Lord my Husband was baniſhed, and thruſt out of his Kingdome, I fled hither, being great with Childe: and here I bare the Prince: and when my Lord my Husband returned ſafe againe, and had the victory, then went I hence, to welcome him home, & from thence I brought my Babe the Prince vnto his Father, when he firſt tooke him in his Armes. And I pray God that my Sonnes Pallace may be as great a ſafe-gard vnto him now raigning, as this place was ſometime to the Kings enemy. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, ſince mans Law ſerueth the Gardian to keepe the Infant. The Law of Nature wils the Mother to keepe her her child, Gods law priuiledgeth the Sanctuary, and the Sanctuary my ſonne, ſith I feare to put him in the Protectors hands, who hath his brother already, and were (if both fayled) inheritour to the Crowne: and the cauſe of my feare, hath no man to doe to examine. But yet I feare no further then the Law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth euery man the cuſtody of them by whoſe death he may inherite leſſe land then a Kingdome. I can no more: but whoſoeuer he be that breaketh this holy Sanctuary, I pray God ſhortly ſend him need of a Sanctuary when he may not come to it, for taken out of Sanctuary I would not that my mortall enemy were.

(36) The Lord Cardinall perceyuing that the Queene waxed euer the longer the further off, and alſo that ſhe began to kindle and chafe, and ſpeake more biting words againſt the Protector, and ſuch as he neuer beleeued, and was alſo loath to heare, he ſaid to her for a finall concluſion, that he no longer would diſpute the matter, but if ſhe were content to deliuer the Duke to him, and to the other Lords preſent, he durſt lay his body and ſoule both in pledge, not onely for his ſurety, but alſo for his eſtate; And if ſhe would giue a reſolute anſwere to the contrary, he would forthwith depart therewithall, and ſhift who ſo would with this buſineſſe afterward, for he neuer intended more to moue her in that matter, in which ſhe thought that he and all others alſo, ſaue her ſelfe, lacked either wit or truth; wit, if they were ſo dull that they could perceiue nothing what the Protector intended: truth, if they ſhould procure her ſonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they ſhould perceiue towards the Childe any euill intended.

(37) The Queene with theſe words ſtood a good while in a deepe ſtudy. And for as much as her ſeemed the Cardinall ready to depart, and the Protector himſelfe ready at hand, ſo as ſhe verily thought ſhe could not keepe him there, but that he ſhould incontinent be taken thence, and to conuey him elſewhere, neither had ſhe time to ſerue her, nor place determined, nor perſons appointed, all things vnready, this meſſage came on her ſo ſuddainly, nothing leſſe looked for, then to haue him fetcht out of Sanctuary, which ſhe thought to be now be-ſet in ſuch places about, that he could not be conueyed out vntaken, and partly (as ſhe thought) it might fortune her feare to be falſe, ſo wel ſhe wiſt it was either needleſſe or bootleſſe: Wherefore, if ſhe muſt needes goe from him, ſhe deemed it beſt to deliuer him; and beſides the Cardinals faith, ſhe nothing doubted, neyther ſome other Lords, whom ſhe ſaw there preſent, which as ſhe feared leſt they might be deceiued, ſo was ſhe well aſſured they would not be corrupted: and thought it would make them the more warily to looke to him, and the more circumſpectly to ſee to his ſurety, if with her owne hands ſhe be-tooke him to them of truſt. And laſtly, taking the young Duke by the hand, ſaid vnto the Lords:

Queene Elizabeth yeeldeth to deliuer the yong Duke.

(38) My Lords, and all my Lords; I neither am ſo vnwiſe to miſtruſt your wits, nor ſo ſuſpitious to miſtruſt your truths: of which thing I purpoſe to make you ſuch a proofe, as if either of both lacked in you, might both turne mee to great ſorrow, the realme to much harme, and you all to great reproach. For loe, here is (quoth ſhe) this Gentleman, whom I doubt not, but I could here keepe ſafe if I would, whatſoeuer any man ſay: and I doubt not alſo, but there be ſome abroad ſo deadly enemies vnto my bloud, that if they wiſt where any of it lay in their owne bodies, they would let it out. We haue alſo experience, that the deſire of a Kingdome knoweth no kindred: the Brother hath beene the Brothers bane: and may the Nephewes be ſure of their Vncle? Each of theſe Children is the others defence, whileſt they are aſunder, and each of their liues lieth in the others body: keepe one ſafe, and both be ſure, and nothing for them both more perillous, then to be in one place: For what wiſe Merchant aduentureth all his goods in one Ship? All this notwithſtanding, I deliuer him, and his brother in him, to keepe, into your hands, of whom I ſhall aske both, before God and the world. Faithfull ye be, that wot I well, and I know well you be wiſe, power and ſtrength to keepe him, if yee liſt, neyther lack yee of your ſelfe, nor lack helpe in this caſe. And if you cannot elſewhere, then may you leaue him here: but onely one thing, I beſeech you, for the truſt that his father euer put in you, and for the truſt I now put you in, that as farre as you thinke I feare too much, be you well wary that you feare not too little: and therewithall ſhe ſaid vnto the Childe, Farewell mine owne ſweet ſon, God ſend you good keeping: let me kiſſe you yet once, ere you goe; for God knoweth when we ſhall kiſſe together againe. And therewithal ſhe kiſſed him, and bleſſed him, turned her back and wept, and went her way, leauing the child weeping as faſt. When the Lord Cardinall, and thoſe other Lords with him, had receiued the young Duke, they brought him into the Star-chamber, where the Protector tooke him in his armes, and kiſſed him, with theſe words: Now welcome my Lord, euen with all my heart: In which ſaying, it is like he ſpake as he thought. Thereupon forth-with they brought him vnto the King his brother, into the Biſhops Pallace at Pauls; and from thence both of them through the Citie of London, honourably attended into the Tower, out of which after that day they neuer came againe.

A Iudas kiſſe.

(39) The Protector hauing both the Children now in his hands, opened himſelfe more boldly, both to certaine other men, and alſo chiefly to the Duke of Buckingham. Although I know that many thought that this Duke was priuy to all the Protectors counſell, euen from the beginning, and ſome of the Protectors friends ſaid, that the Duke was the firſt mouer of the Protector to this matter, ſending a priuy meſſenger vnto him ſtreight after King Edwards death. But others againe, which knew better the ſubtill wit of the Protector, deny that he euer opened his enterpriſe to the Duke, vntill he had brought to paſſe the things before rehearſed. But when he had impriſoned the Queenes kindred, and gotten both her ſonnes into his owne hands; then he opened the reſt of his purpoſe with leſſe feare to them whom he thought meet for the matter, and eſpecially to the Duke, who being wonne to his deſignes, he held his ſtrength more then halfe increaſed. The matter was broken vnto the Duke by ſubtill perſons, and ſuch as were their crafts-maſters in the handling of ſuch wicked deuiſes: who declared vnto him that the young King was offended with him, for his kinsfolkes ſakes, and if he were euer able he would reuenge them; who would pricke him forward thereunto if they eſcaped (for they would remember their impriſonment) or elſe if they were put to death, without doubt the yong King would be carefull for their deaths, whoſe impriſonments was grieuous vnto him. And that with repenting the Duke ſhould nothing auayle, for there was no way left to redeeme his offence by benefits, but he ſhould ſooner deſtroy himſelfe then ſaue the King, who with his Brother, and his kinsfolkes he ſaw in ſuch places impriſoned, as the Protector might with a beck deſtroy them all: and without all doubt would doe it indeed, if there were any new enterpriſe attempted. And that it was likely as the Protector had prouided priuy gard for himſelfe, ſo had he ſpials for the Duke, and traines to haue caught him, if he ſhould be againſt him, and that peraduenture from them whom he leaſt ſuſpected. For the ſtate of things, and the diſpoſitions of men then were ſuch, that a man could not well tell whom he might truſt, or whom he might feare. Theſe things, and ſuch like, being beaten into the Dukes minde, brought him to that poynt, that where he had repented the way that he had entred, yet would he goe forward in the ſame, and ſince he had once begun, he would ſtoutly goe through. And therefore to this wicked enterpriſe which he beleeued beleeued could not be auoyded, he bent himselfe, determining, sith the common mischiefe could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie.

The couenants betwixt the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham.

(40) Then was it agreed, that the Protector should haue the Dukes ayde to make him King, and that the Protectors only lawfull sonne should marry the Dukes daughter; and that the Protector should grant him the quiet possession of the Earledome of Hertford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in King Edwards time. Besides these requests of the Duke, the Protector of his owne accord, promised him a great quantitie of the Kings treasurie, and of his houshold stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwixt themselues, they went about to prepare for the Coronation of the yong King as they would haue it seeme. And that they might turne both the eyes and mindes of men from perceiuing of their drifts otherwhere, the Lords were sent for from all parts of the Realme, and came flocking vnto the solemnitie. But the Protector and Duke after they had sent the Lord Cardinall Archbishop of Yorke, then L. Chancellor, the Bishop of Ely, the Lords Stanley, & Hastings, then Lord Chamberlaine, with many other Noblemen, to conferre and deuise about the Coronation in one place, as fast they were in another place contriuing the contrary, to make the Protector King: to which counsel, albeit there were adhibited very few, and they very secret; yet began here and there, some muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neither knew what they feared, nor wherefore: were it that before such great things, mens hearts of a secret instinct of nature mis-giue them, as the Sea without winde swelleth of himselfe sometime before a tempest; or were it that some one man happily somewhat perceiuing, filled many men with suspition, though he shewed few men what hee knew. Howbeit somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the counsell were close: For by little and little, all men with-drew from the Tower, and repaired to Crosbies in Bishopsgate streete, where the Protector kept his house in great state. So that the Protector had the resort, and the King left in a manner desolate. And whilest some for their businesse made suite to such as were in office for the King, some were secretly by their friends warned, that it might happely doe them no good, to be too much attendant about the King without the Protectors appointment, who then began to remoue many of the Princes olde seruants, and in their stead to place about him new.

Two counsels to diuers ends.

The mistrust of the times.

All flocke to the Protector.

(41) Thus many things meeting together, partly by purpose, and partly by chance, caused at length not onely the common people, that moue with the winde, but wisemen also, and some Lords likewise, to marke and muse at the matter; insomuch, that the Lord Stanley, who was after Earle of Darby, said to the Lord Hastings, that he much misliked these two seuerall counsels. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little wot we, whereof they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings) of my life neuer doubt you: for while * one man is there, which is neuer thence, neuer can things be moued that should sound amisse against me, but it shall be in mine eares ere it be well out of their mouths: this ment he by Catesby, which was of his neere counsell, and whom he very familiarly vsed, and in his most waighty matters put no man in so speciall trust, nor no man so much beholden vnto him as Catesby was. A man indeed well learned in the Lawes of this Land, and by speciall fauour of the Lord Chamberlaine, in good authority, and bare much rule in Leicestershire, where the Lord Hastings power chiefly lay. But surely great pittie it was, that he had not had either more truth, or lesse wit. For his dissimulation onely kept all that mischiefe vp: in whom, if the Lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the Lord Stanley and he had departed, with diuers other Lords, and had broken all the dance, for many ill signes that he saw, which he now construes all to the best: So surely thought he that there could be no harme towards him intended, in that counsell where Catesby was. And of truth, the Protector and Duke of Buckingham, made very good semblance vnto the Lord Hastings, whom vndoubtedly the Protector loued well, and loath was to haue lost him, but for feare least his life should haue quailed their purpose; for which cause hee moued Catesby to proue with some words, cast out a farre off, whether he could thinke it possible to win the Lord Chamberlaine to their part. But Catesby whether he assayed him, or assayed him not, reported vnto them, as he found him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible words, that hee durst no further breake. True it is, that the Lord Chamberlaine, of very trust shewed vnto Catesby, the distrust that others began to haue in the matter: and therefore Catesby fearing, as he affirmed, least their motion might with the Lord Hastings diminish his credence, whereunto onely all the matter leaned; he counselled and procured the Protector hastily to rid him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death, to obtaine much of the rule that the Lord Hastings bare in his Country: the only desire whereof, was the allectiue that induced him to be partner, and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

Catesby set to sound the Lord Hastings.

The counsell sate in the Tower for the ordering of the yong Kings Coronation.

(42) Soone after this, vpon Friday the thirteenth day of Iune, many Lords assembled in the Tower, and there sate in counsell, deuising the honorable solemnitie of the Kings Coronation; of the which the time appointed was so neere, that the Pageants and subtilties were in making day and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed, that afterward was cast away. These Lords sitting together communing of this matter, the Protector came in amongst them about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteously, and excusing himselfe, that he had beene from them so long, saying merrily, I haue beene a sleeper this day. And after a little talke with them, he said to the Bishop of Ely; My Lord, you haue very good Strawburies at your Garden in Holborne: I pray you let vs haue a messe of them. Gladly my Lord, said the Bishop, would God I had some better thing as ready to pleasure you as that: and therewith in all haste he sent his seruant for a messe of Strawburies. Whereupon the Protector setting the Lords fast in conference, prayed them to spare him for a little while, and departed thence. But soone after, betwixt tenne and eleauen, he returned into the Counsell-Chamber amongst them, with a wonderfull sowre and angry countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lippes, sate him downe in his place, all the Lords much dismayed, sore maruelling of this his suddaine change, and what thing should him ayle: He sitting thus a while, began thus to speake: What are they worthy to haue, that compasse and imagine the destruction of mee, beeing so neere of bloud vnto the King, and Protector of his royall person and his Realme? At which question, all the Lords sate sore astonied, musing much by whom this question should be meant, of which euery man knew himselfe cleare.

Catesby the cause of much mischiefe.

(43) Then the Lord Chamberlaine, as he that for the loue betwixt them, thought he might be bouldest with him, answered and said, That they were worthy to be punished as haynous Traitors whatsoeuer they were: and the same all the other Lords affirmed. That is (quoth the Protector) yonder Sorceresse my brothers wife, meaning the Queene, and others with her: at these words many of the Lords that fauoured her, were greatly abashed: but the L. Hastings was in his minde better content, that it was moued by her, then by any other whom he loued better: howbeit, his heart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as he he was of the taking of her kindred, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before deuised to be beheaded at Pomfret the selfe-same day, in which he was not aware, how it was by other deuised, that himselfe should be beheaded the same day at London. Then said the Protector, yee shall all see in what wise that Sorceresse, and that other Witch of her councell, Shores wife, with their affinity, haue by their sorcerie and witchcraft wasted my body. And therewith he plucked vp his doublet sleeue to the elbow vpon his left arme, where he shewed a weariſh withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other.

The Queene accused of Sorcery.

The withered arme of the Protector by nature, and not by sorcery.

(44) And thereupon euery mans minde sore misgaue them, well perceiuing that this matter was but a quarrell: For they well knew, that the Queene was too wise to go about any such folly; and if she would, yet would she of all others, not make Shores Wife of counsell, whom of all Women she most hated, as that Concubine whom the King her Husband had most loued. And also no man there present, but knew well enough, that his arme was euer such since his birth. Neuertheless the Lord Chamberlaine, (which from the death of King Edward kept Shores Wife, on whom he somewhat doated in the Kings life, sauing as it is said, that he forbare her for reuerence towards the King, or else of a certaine kinde of fidelity to his friend) answered and said: Certainely my Lord, if they haue so heinously done, they be worthy of hainous punishment. What (quoth the Protector) thou seruest mee I ween with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make good on thy body Traitor. And therewith as in a great anger, he clapped his fist vpon the board a great rap: at which token giuen, one without the Chamber cryed, treason, wherewith a doore clapped, and in came rushing men in harnesse, as many as the Chamber might hold, and anone the Protector said to the Lord Hastings, I arrest thee Traitor: What me my Lord, quoth he? yea thee Traitor, quoth the Protector; and another let flie at the Lord Stanley, who shrunke at the stroke vnder the Table, or else his head had beene cleft to the teeth: for as swiftly as he shrunke, yet came the bloud about his eares. Then were they all quickly bestowed in diuers Chambers, excepting onely the Lord Chamberlaine, whom the Protector bad speede and shriue him apace, for by S^t. Paul said he, I will not to dinner till I see thy head off. It booted him not to aske why, but heauily tooke a Priest at aduenture, and made a short shrift, for a longer would not be suffered; the Protector made so much haste to dinner, which he might not goe to, till this was done, for sauing of his oath. So was he brought forth vnto the greene, before the Chappell within the Tower, and his head laide downe vpon a long logge of timber, and there strucke off, and afterward his body with the head, was enterred at Windsor, beside the body of King Edward.

(45) A maruailous case it is to heare, eyther of the warnings that he should haue voyded, or the tokens of that he could not auoid: for the selfe-night before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a trusty secret Messenger vnto him at Mid-night in all the haste, requiring him to rise, and ride away with him, for he was vtterly disposed no longer to abide, he had so fearefull a dreame: in which he thought, that a Bore with his tuskes, so razed them both by the heads, that the bloud ranne about both their shoulders. And forasmuch as the Protector gaue the Bore for his cognizance, this dreame made so fearefull an impression in his heart, that he was throughly determined no longer to tarry, but had his Horse ready, if the Lord Hastings would goe with him, to ride yet so farre the same night, that they would be out of danger before it was day. Ah good Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings to the Messenger) leaneth my Lord thy Master so much to such trifles, and hath faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fan-tasieth, or doe rise in the nights rest, by reason of the dayes thoughts? Tell him it is plaine Witchcraft, to beleeue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh he not, that we might be as likely to make them true by our going, if we were caught and brought backe (as friends faile flyers) for then had the Bore a cause likely to rase vs with his tuskes, as men that fled for some falshood: wherefore, either there is no perill, nor none there is indeed, or if any be, it is rather in going then abiding: And if we must needs fall in perill, one way or other, yet had I rather, that men should see, it were by other mens falshood, then thinke it our fault or faint heart. And therefore go to thy Master man, and commend me to him; and pray him to be merry, and haue no feare; for I assure him, I am as sure of the man that he wotteth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send Grace Sir, (said the Messenger) and went his way.

The L. Hastings answere to the Lord Stanleyes message.

(46) Certaine it is also, that in riding towards the Tower the same morning in which hee was beheaded, his Horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to the falling; which thing, albeit each man knoweth daily hapneth, to them to whom no such mischance is toward, yet hath it beene of an olde rite and custome obserued, as a token oftentimes, notably foregoing some great mis-fortune: Now this that followeth was no warning, but an enuious scorne. The same morning before hee was vp, came a Knight vnto him, as it were of curtesie, to accompany him to the Counsell; but of truth sent by the Protector, to haste him thitherwards, with whom he was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a meane man at that time, but now of great authority. This Knight, when it happened the Lord Chamberlain by the way to stay his horse, and commune a while with a Priest whom hee met in Tower-street, brake his tale, and said merrily to him; what my Lord, I pray you come on, whereto talke you so long with a Priest? you haue no need of a Priest yet, and therewith laughed vpon him, as though hee would say, yee shall haue soone. But so little wist the other what hee meant, and so little mistrusted his present perill, as hee neuer was merrier, nor neuer so full of good hope in his life, which selfe thing is often seene a signe of change; but I shall rather let any thing passe mee, then the vaine surety of mans minde so neere his death. Vpon the very Tower-wharfe, so neere the place where his head was strooke off soone after, there met he with one Hastings, a Pursuant of his owne name: And of their meeting in that place, hee was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before, to meet in the like manner together in the same place. At which other time the Lord Chamberlaine had beene accused vnto King Edward by the Lord Riuers the Queenes Brother, in such wise as hee was for the while, (but it lasted not long) farre fallen into the Kings indignation, and stood in great feare of himselfe. And forasmuch as hee now mette this Pursuant in the same place, that ieopardy so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him thereof; with whom hee had before talked thereof in the same place, while hee was therein. And therefore he said, ah Hastings, art thou remembred that I met thee once here with a heauie heart? yea my Lord (quoth hee) that remember I well, and thanked be God, they got no good, nor you no great harme. Thou wouldest say so (quoth hee) if thou knew so much as I know, which few know else as yet, and more shall shortly. That meant hee by the Lords of the Queenes kindred, which were taken before, and should that same day bee beheaded at Pomfret: which hee well wist, but was nothing aware, that the axe hung ouer his owne head. In faith man (quoth hee) I was neuer so sorry, nor neuer stood in so great dread of my life, as I did when thou and I met here; And loe, how the world is changed, now stand my enemies in the danger (as thou maiſt hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life ſo merry, nor neuer in ſo great ſurety. Oh good God, the blindneſſe of our mortall nature! when he moſt feared, he was in good ſuretie, when he reckoned himſelfe ſureſt, he loſt his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honourable man, a good Knight and a gentle, of great authority with his Prince, of liuing ſomewhat diſſolute, plaine and open to his enemies, and ſecret to his friends, eaſie to be beguiled, as he that of good heart and courage fore-ſtudied no perils; a louing man, a paſſing well-beloued: very faithfull, and truſty enough, truſting indeed too much. Now flew the fame of this Lords death ſwiftly through the Citie, and from thence further, like a winde, in euery mans eare.

The deſcription of the Lord Hastings.

Citizens ſent for into the Tower to the Protector.

(47) But the Protector immediately after dinner, intending to ſet ſome colour vpon the matter, ſent in all haſt for many ſubſtantiall men, out of the City into the Tower, at whoſe comming thither, himſelfe with the Duke of Buckingham, ſtood harneſſed in olde ruſty briganders, ſuch as no more, man ſhould weene, that they would vouchſafe to haue put on their backes, except that ſome ſuddain neceſſity had conſtrayned them thereto. And then the Protector ſhewed them, that the Lord Chamberlaine, and others of his conſpiracy, had contriued to haue ſuddainly deſtroyed him and the Duke there the ſame day in Counſell. And what they intended further, was not yet well knowne. Of which their treaſon he neuer had knowledge, before ten of the clocke, the ſame fore-noone, which ſuddaine feare droue them to put on for their defence, ſuch harneſſe as came next to hand: and ſo had God holpen them, that the miſchiefe returned vpon them that would haue done it: and this he required them to report.

The fained feare of the Lord Protector.

(48) Euery man anſwered him faire, as though no man miſtruſted the matter, which of truth no man beleeued; yet for the further appeaſing of the peoples minde, he ſent immediately after dinner, in all haſte, an Herald of Armes, with a Proclamation to be made through the City, in the Kings name, containing that the Lord Haſtings, with diuers others of his traiterous purpoſe, had before conſpired the ſame day, to haue ſlaine the Lord Protector, and Duke of Buckingham, ſitting in the Councell, and after to haue taken vpon them, to rule the King and the Realme, at their owne pleaſures; thereby to pill and ſpoyle whom they liſted, vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that Proclamation, deuiſed to the ſlander of the Lord Chamberlaine, as that he was an euill Counſeller to the Kings father, entiſing him to many things, highly redounding to his great diſhonour, and to the vniuerſall hurt of his Realme, by his euill company, ſiniſter procuring, and vngratious example, aſwell in many other things, as in the vicious liuing, and inordinate abuſion of his body, both with many others, and eſpecially with Shores Wife, who was one alſo of his moſt ſecret Counſell, in this hainous treaſon, with whom he lay nightly, and namely, the night laſt paſt before his death, ſo that it was the leſſe maruell, if vngracious liuing brought him to an vnhappy ending, which he was now put vnto, by the moſt dread commandement of the Kings Highneſſe, and of his honourable and faithfull Counſell, both for his demerits, being ſo openly taken in his falſely conceyued treaſon, as alſo leaſt the delaying of his execution, might haue encouraged other miſchieuous perſons, partners of his conſpiracy, to gather and aſſemble themſelues together in making ſome great commotion for his deliuerance, whoſe hope being now by his well-deſerued death politickely repreſſed, all the Realme ſhould by Gods grace, reſt in good quiet and peace.

A Proclamation made to publiſh the Lord Haſtings treaſons.

(49) Now was this Proclamation made within two houres, after that he was beheaded, and was ſo curiouſly indited, and ſo faire written in Parchment, in ſo well a ſet hand, and therewith of it ſelfe ſo long a proceſſe, as euery child might perceiue, that it was prepared before. For all the time between his death, and the proclaiming, could ſcant haue ſufficed vnto the bare writing alone; had it beene but in paper, and ſcribled forth in haſt at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was Schoole-maſter of Pauls, of chance ſtanding by, and comparing the ſhortneſſe of the time, with the length of the matter, ſaid vnto them that ſtood about him; Here is a gay goodly caſt, foule caſt away for haſt: and a Merchant anſwered him, that it was written by Propheſie. Now then by and by, as it were for anger, not for couetouſneſſe, the Protector ſent the Sheriffes of London, into the houſe of Shores Wife (for her Husband dwelled not with her) and ſpoyled her of all that ſhee had, aboue the value of three thouſand markes, carrying her through London vnto the Tower, and there left her Priſoner, where (for faſhion ſake) he laide to her charge, that ſhe went about to bewitch him, and that ſhee was of Counſell with the Lord Chamberlaine to deſtroy him: In concluſion, when no colour could faſten vpon theſe matters, then laide he hainouſly vnto her charge, the thing that her ſelfe could not deny, that all the World wiſt was true, and that neithleſſe euery man laughed at, to heare it then ſo ſuddainly, ſo highly taken, that ſhee was nought of her body. And for that cauſe (as a good continent Prince, cleare and faultleſſe himſelfe, ſent out of Heauen into this vitious World for the amendment of mens manners) after ſhe had laine priſoner in Ludgate, he cauſed the Biſhop of London to put her to open penance, going before the Croſſe in proceſſion vpon a Sunday, with a Taper in her hand. In which ſhee went in countenance and pace demure, ſo womanly, and albeit ſhee were out of all array ſaue her Kirtle onely, yet went ſhe ſo faire and louely, namely while the wondering of the people caſt a comly rud in her cheeks (of which before ſhe had moſt miſt) that her great ſhame, wan her much praiſe, among thoſe that were more amorous of her body, then curious of her ſoule. And many good folke alſo that hated her liuing, and glad to ſee ſinne ſo corrected, yet pitied the more her penance, then rejoyced therein, when they conſidered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any vertuous affection.

The Sheriffes of London carry Shores wife to priſon.

Shores wife did penance.

All commend and pitty Shores wife.

(50) This Woman was borne in London, worſhipfully friended, honeſtly brought vp, and very well married, ſauing ſomewhat too ſoone; her Husband an honeſt Citizen, young, and goodly, and of good ſubſtance. But for as much as they were coupled ere ſhee were well ripe, ſhee not very feruently loued, for whom ſhe neuer longed; which was haply the thing that the more made her incline vnto the Kings appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the reſpect of his royalty, the hope of gay apparell, eaſe, pleaſure, and other wanton wealth, was able ſoone to pierce a ſoft tender heart. But when the King had abuſed her, anone her Husband (as he was an honeſt man, and one that could his good, not preſuming to touch a Kings Concubine) left her vp to him altogether. When the King dyed, the Lord Chamberlaine tooke her, which in the Kings daies, albeit he was ſore enamoured vpon her, yet hee forbare her, either for reuerence, or for a certaine friendly faithfulneſſe: proper ſhe was, and faire; nothing in her body that you could haue changed, vnleſſe you would haue wiſhed her ſomewhat higher. Thus they ſay that knew her in her youth. Albeit ſome that now ſee her (for as yet ſhe liueth) deeme her neuer to haue beene well viſaged, whoſe judgement ſeemeth to mee ſomewhat like, as though we could geſſe the beauty of one long before departed, by her ſcalpe taken out of the Charnell-houſe: for now ſhee is olde, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but riueled skinne, and hard bone; and yet being euen ſuch, who ſo well aduiſe her viſage, might geſſe and deuiſe, which parts how filled, would make it a faire face, face. Yet delighted not men, ſo much in her beautie, as in her pleaſant behauiour, for a proper wit ſhe had, and could both reade well and write, merry in compāny, ready and quicke of anſwere, neither mute nor full of babble, ſometime taunting without diſpleaſure, and not without diſport: in whom King Edward tooke ſpeciall pleaſure, whoſe fauour to ſay the truth (for ſinne it were to belie the Diuell) ſhe neuer abuſed to any mans hurt, but to many a mans comfort and reliefe; when the King tooke diſpleaſure, ſhe would mittigate and appeaſe his minde; where men were out of fauour, ſhee would bring them in his grace, for many that highly offended ſhe obtayned pardon. Of great forfeitures ſhee gat them remiſſion. And finally, in many weightie ſuites ſhe ſtood many men in great ſtead, either for none, or very ſmall rewards, and thoſe rather gay then rich, either for that ſhe was content with the deed it ſelfe well done, or for that ſhee delighted to be ſued vnto, and to ſhew what ſhe was able to do with the King, or for that wanton women and wealthy, be not alwaies couetous.. I doubt not ſome ſhall thinke this Woman too ſlight a thing to be written of, and ſet among the remembrances of great matters: which they ſhall ſpecially thinke, that happily ſhall eſteeme her onely by that they now ſee her. But to my ſeeming, the chance is ſo much the more worthy to be remembred, in how much ſhee is now in the more beggerly condition, vnfriended, and worne out of acquaintance, after good ſubſtance, after ſo great fauour with a Prince, after ſo great ſuit and ſeeking to, of all thoſe, that in thoſe daies had buſineſſe to ſpeede, as many other men were in their times, which be now famous onely by the infamy of their ill deedes: her doings were not much leſſe, albeit they be much leſſe remembred, becauſe they were not ſo euill: for men vſe, if they receiue an euill turne, to write it in Marble: and who ſo doth vs a good turne, wee write it in the duſt; which is not worſt proued by her: for at this day ſhe beggeth of many, at this day liuing, that at this day had begged if ſhe had not beene.

Shores wife did much good, but no man hurt.

The Subject not vnworthy to be written.

The ſtate of the World.

(51) Now it was ſo deuiſed by the Protector and his Councell, that the ſelfe-ſame day in which the L. Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the ſelfe-ſame houre, was then (not without his aſſent) beheaded at Pomfret, the foreremembred Lords and Knights, that were taken from the King at Northampton, and Stony-Stratford; which thing was done in the preſence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whoſe ſeruice the Protector ſpecially vſed in that counſell, and in the execution of ſuch lawleſſe enterpriſes, as a man that had beene long ſecret with him, hauing experience of the World, and a ſhrewd wit, ſhort and rude in ſpeech, rough and boiſterous of behauiour, bolde in miſchiefe, as farre from pitty, as from all feare of God. This Knight bringing them out of priſon to the Scaffold, and ſhewing to the people preſent, that they were Traitors, not ſuffering them to ſpeake, or declare their innocency, leſt their words might haue inclined men to pitty them, and to hate the Protector and his part; cauſed them haſtily without Iudgement, proceſſe, or manner of order to be beheaded, and without all guilt, but onely that they were good men, too true to the King, and too nigh to the Queene.

The Lords of the Queenes bloud beheaded at Pomfret.

(52) Now when the Lord Chamberlaine, and thoſe other Lords and Knights were thus beheaded and ridde out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men muſed what the matter meant, while the Lords of the Realme were about him out of their owne ſtrengths, while no man wiſt what to thinke, nor whom to truſt, before they ſhould haue ſpace to diſpute, and digeſt the matter, and make parties, it were beſt haſtily to purſue his purpoſe, and put himſelfe in poſſeſſion of the Crowne, ere men could haue time to deuiſe how to reſiſt. But now was all the ſtudy, by what meanes the matter being of it ſelfe ſo hainous, might be firſt broken to the people in ſuch wiſe as it might be well taken. To this counſell they tooke diuers, ſuch as they thought meete to be truſted, likely to be induced to that part, and able to ſtand them in ſtead, either by power or policy: Among whom they made of counſell Edmond Shaa Knight, then Major of London, who vpon truſt of his owne aduancement, wherof he was of a proud heart, highly deſirous, ſhould frame the Citie to their appetite. Of Spirituall men they tooke ſuch as had wit, and were in authoritie among the people, for opinion of their learning, and had no ſcrupulous conſcience. Among theſe had they Iohn Shaa Clerke, brother to the Major, and Fryer Pinker Prouinciall of the Auguſtine Friers; both of them Doctors in Diuinity, both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, and of more fame then learning: for they were before greatly eſteemed of the common people; but after that neuer. Of theſe two, the one made a Sermon in prayſe of the Protector before the Coronation; the other after, both ſo full of teadious flattery, as no mans eare could abide them.

The Major of London made of the Protectors counſell.

Shaa and Pinker two flattering Preachers.

(53) Pinker in his Sermon ſo loſt his voyce, that he was forced to leaue off, and came downe in the middeſt. Doctor Shaa by his Sermon loſt his honeſty, and ſoone after his life, for very ſhame of the world, into which he durſt neuer after come abroad. But the Fryer forced for no ſhame, and ſo it harmed him the leſſe. Howbeit ſome doubt, and many thinke, that Pinker was not of counſell in the matter before the Coronation, but after the common manner, fell to flattery after: namely, ſith his Sermon was not incontinent vpon it, but at Saint Maries Hoſpitall in the Eaſter Weeke following. But certaine it is, that Doctor Shaa was of counſell in the beginning, ſo farre forth as they determined that he ſhould firſt breake the matter in a Sermon at Pauls-Croſſe, in which he ſhould by the authority of his preaching, incline the people to the Protectors ghoſtly purpoſe. But now was all the labour and ſtudy, in the deuiſe of ſome conuenient pretext; for which the people ſhould be content to depoſe the Prince, and accept the Protector for King. In which diuers things they deuiſed: but the chiefe thing and the weightieſt of all, the inuention reſted in this, that they ſhould alledge baſtardy, either in King Edward himſelfe, or in his Children, or both. So that hee ſhould ſeeme diſabled to inherite the Crowne, by the Duke of Yorke, and the Prince by him. To lay baſtardie in King Edward, ſounded openly to the rebuke of the Protectors owne Mother, who was Mother to them both: for in that poynt could be none other colour, but to pretend that his owne Mother was an adultereſſe, which notwithſtanding to further the purpoſe he letted not: but yet he would that poynt ſhould be leſſe, and more fauourably handled, not fully plaine and directly, but that the matter ſhould be touched aſlope, and craftily, as though men ſpared in that poynt to ſpeake all the truth for feare of his diſpleaſure. But the other poynt, concerning the baſtardie that they deuiſed to ſurmiſe in King Edwards Children, that would he ſhould be openly declared, and enforced to the vttermoſt. The colour and pretext whereof, was a contract pretended to be made by King Edward vnto the Lady Lucy, whereof we haue ſpoken in the raigne of the ſaid King: which inuention how ſimple ſoeuer, yet it liked them, to whom it ſufficed to haue ſomewhat to ſay, while they were ſure to be compelled to no larger proofe then themſelues liſt to make.

Pinker preached at Saint Maries Hoſpitall, and Doctor Shaa at Pauls-Croſſe.

(54) Now then it was by the Protector and his Councell concluded, that Doctor Shaa ſhould ſignifie in his Sermon aforeſaid, that neither King Edward himſelfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begot, nor were the very Children of the Duke of Yorke, but begot vnlawfully by other perſons, by Adulterie of the Dutches their Mother. And alſo that that Dame Elizabeth Lucy was verily the Wife of King Edward, and ſo the Prince and all his other children, begot by the Queene, were all of them baſtards. And according to this deuiſe Doctor Shaa vpon Sunday the nineteenth of Iune, at Pauls-Croſſe, in a frequent aſſembly, tooke for the theame of his Sermon this ſaying, Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas: Baſtard ſlips ſhall neuer take deepe roote. Whereupon, when he had ſhewed the great grace that God giueth, and ſecretly infundeth in right generation after the lawes of Matrimonie, then declared hee, that commonly thoſe children lacked that grace, and for the puniſhment of their parents, were for the more part vnhappy, which were begot in baſe, but ſpecially in adultery. Of which though ſome by the ignorance of the world, and the truth hid from knowledge inherite for the time other mens lands, yet God alwaies ſo prouideth, that it continueth not in their bloud long, but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors be reſtored, and the baſtards ſlip pulled vp ere it can take any deepe root. And when he had laide for the proofe and confirmation of this ſentence certaine examples taken out of the Old teſtament, and other ancient Hiſtories, then he began to deſcend into the prayſe of the Lord Richard, late Duke of Yorke, calling him the father to the Lord Protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the Crowne, to whom it was after the death of King Henry the ſixt, entayled by authority of Parliament. Then ſhewed he, that the very right heire of his body lawfully begotten, was onely the Lord Protector. For he declared then that King Edward was neuer lawfully married vnto the Queene, but was before God, Husband vnto Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and ſo his Children baſtards. And beſides that, neither King Edward himſelfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, among thoſe that were ſecret in the Houſhold, were reckoned very certainly for the children of the noble Duke, as thoſe that by their features reſembled other knowne men more then him, from whoſe vertuous conditions, he ſaid alſo, that King Edward was far off. But the Lord Protector, he ſaid, the very Noble Prince, the ſpeciall patterne of Knightly proweſſe, as well in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his Viſage, repreſenting the very face of the Noble Duke his father: This is (quoth he) the fathers own figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his viſage, the very vndoubted Image and plaine expreſſe likeneſſe of that noble Duke.

Shaas ſhameleſſe aſſertions.

(55) Now it was before deuiſed, that in the ſpeaking of theſe words, the Protector ſhould haue come in among the people to the Sermon ward, to the end that thoſe words meeting with his preſence, might haue beene taken among the hearers, as though the holy Ghoſt had put them in the Preachers mouth, and ſhould haue moued the people euen then to cry, King Richard, King Richard, that it might haue been after ſaid, that he was ſpecially choſen by God, and in manner by miracle. But this deuiſe quayled, either by the Protectors negligence, or by the Preachers ouer-much diligence; for while the Protector found by the way tarrying, leſt he ſhould preuent thoſe words, and the Doctor fearing leaſt he ſhould come ere his Sermon could come to theſe words, haſted his matter thereto, who was come to them and paſt them, and had entred into other matter ere the Protector came. Whom when hee beheld comming, he ſuddainely left the matter with which he was in hand, and without any deduction thereunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repeate thoſe words againe: This is the very Noble Prince, the ſpeciall paterne of Knightly proweſſe, which as well in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his viſage, repreſenteth the very face of the Noble Duke of Yorke his father: this is the Fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his Viſage, the ſure vndoubted Image, the plaine expreſſe likeneſſe of the Noble Duke, whoſe remembrance can neuer die while hee liueth. While theſe words were in ſpeaking, the Protector, accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people, into the place where the Doctors commonly ſtand in an vpper Storie, where he ſtood to heare the Sermon. But the people were ſo farre from crying King Richard, that they ſtood as if they had beene turned into ſtones, for wonder of this ſhamefull Sermon. After which once ended, the Preacher got him home, and neuer after durſt looke out for ſhame, but kept himſelfe out of ſight like an Owle. And when he once asked one, that had beene his olde friend, what the people talked of him, albeit that his own conſcience well ſhewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other anſwered him, that there was in euery mans mouth ſpoken of him much ſhame, it ſo ſtrucke him to the heart, that within few daies after, he withered and conſumed away.

The Preachers intention preuented.

Gods heauy puniſhment vpon the falſe flattering Preacher.

(56) On the Tueſday following this Sermon, there came into the Guild-Hall in London the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuers Lords and Knights, more perchance then knew the meſſage which they brought. And there in the Eaſt end of the Hall, where the Major keepeth the huſtings, the Major, and Aldermen being aſſembled about him, and all the Commons of the City gathered before him: after ſilence commanded in the Protectors name vpon great paine, the Duke ſtood vp, and (as he was neither vnlearned, and of nature maruellouſly well ſpoken) he ſaid vnto the people with a cleare and loud voyce in this manner: Friends, for the zeale and hearty fauour that we beare you, wee be come to breake vnto you, a matter of great weight, and no leſſe weighty, then pleaſing to God, and profitable to all the Realme: nor to no part of the Realme more profitable then to you the Citizens of this noble City. For why, the thing that we wot well you haue long time lacked, and ſo longed for, that you would haue giuen great good for, that you would haue gone farre to fetch, that thing wee be come hither to bring you, without your labour, paine, coſt, aduenture, or jeopardie. What thing is that? Certes, the ſurety of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wiues, and your daughters, the ſafeguard of your goods: of all which things in times paſt you ſtood euermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that could account himſelfe Lord of his owne goods, among ſo many ſnares and traps as were ſet therefore, among ſo much pilling and polling, among ſo many taxes and tallages, of which there was neuer end, and often times no need: or if any were, it rather grew of riot, and vnreaſonable waſte, then any neceſſary or honorable charge: So that there was daily pilling from good men and honeſt, great ſubſtance of goods, to be laſhed out among vnthrifts, ſo farre forth that fifteenes ſufficed not, nor any vſuall manner of knowne taxes: but vnder an eaſie name of beneuolence and good will, the Commiſſioners ſo much of euery man took, as no man could with his good will haue giuen. As though that name of beneuolence, had ſignified that euery man ſhould pay not what himſelfe of his owne good will liſt to grant, but what the King of his good will liſt to take. Who neuer asked little, but euery thing was haunſed aboue the meaſure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ranſomes; ſmall treſpaſſes into miſpriſion; miſpriſion into treaſon. Whereof I thinke no man looketh that we ſhould remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, who was for a word in haſte ſpoken, cruelly beheaded, by the miſconſtruing of the Lawes of this Realme for the Princes pleaſure: with no leſſe honour to Markham then chiefe Iuſtice, that left his office rather then hee would aſſent to that judgement, then to the diſhoneſty of thoſe, that either for feare or flattery gaue that judgement. And in that point, which in good faith I am "ſorry to ſpeake of, ſauing that it is in vaine to keepe "in counſell that thing which euery man knoweth; "the Kings greedy appetite was inſatiable, and eue- "ry where ouer all the Realme intollerable, for no

The Dukes pithy perſwaſions vnto the Citizens.

(57) When the Duke had ſaid, and looked that the people whom hee hoped the Maior had framed before, ſhould after this propoſition made, haue cryed, King Richard, King Richard; all was huſht and mute, and not a word anſwered thereunto: wherewith the Duke was maruailouſly abaſhed, and taking the Maior neerer to him, with other that were about him priuie to that matter, ſaid vnto him ſoftly, What meaneth this, that the people be ſo ſilent? Sir (quoth the Maior) perchance they perceiue you not well; that ſhall we mend (quoth he) if that will helpe. And by and by ſomewhat lowder, he rehearſed them the ſame matter againe, in other order, and other words, ſo well and ornately, ſo euidently and plaine, with voyce, geſture, and countenance ſo comely, that euery man much maruailed that heard him, and thought they neuer had in their hearing, ſo euill a tale ſo well told. But were it for wonder or feare, or that each man lookt that other ſpeake firſt; not a word was there anſwered of all the people that ſtood before, but was as ſtill as the midnight, not ſo much as rowning among themſelues, by which they might ſeeme to commune what was beſt to doe. When the Lord Maior ſaw this, hee, with the other partners of that counſell drew about the Duke, and ſaid, That the people had not beene accuſtomed there to bee ſpoken vnto, but by the Recorder; who is the mouth of the Citie, and happily to him they will anſwere. With that the Recorder called Fitz-William, a ſad man and an honeſt, who was ſo newly come into that office, that hee neuer had ſpoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to beginne; notwithſtanding, thereunto commanded by the Maior, he made rehearſal to the Commons, of that the Duke had twice rehearſed to them himſelfe. But the Recorder ſo tempered his tale, that hee ſhewed euery thing as the Dukes words, and no part of his owne. But all this noting, no change made in the people, which ſtood gazing at the Bench as men altogether amazed. Whereupon the Duke rowned vnto the Maior, and ſaid, This is maruailous obſtinate ſilence, and therewith he turned vnto the people againe with theſe words: Deare friends, we come to moue you to that thing which peraduenture wee not ſo greatly needed, but that the Lords of this Realme, and the Commons of other parts might haue ſufficed, ſauing that we beare you ſuch loue, and ſo much ſet by your friendſhip, that we would not willingly doe without you the thing which is for our honour and your wealth, which as it ſeemeth, either you ſee not, or wey not; wherefore we require you, giue vs anſwer, whether ye be minded as all the Nobles of the Realm be, to haue this noble Prince now Protector, to bee your King or not.

(58) At which words the people beganne to whiſper among themſelues ſecretly, that the voyce was neither loud nor diſtinct, but as it were the ſound of a ſwarme of Bees, till at the laſt, in the nether end of the Hall, a buſhment of the Dukes ſeruants, and Naſh-fields, and of others belonging to the Protector, with ſome Prentiſes and laddes that thruſt into the Hall among the preſſe, beganne ſodainely at mens backes to cry out as loud as their throats would giue, King Richard, King Richard, & threw vp their caps in token of ioy. But they that ſtood before, caſt backe their heads, maruelling thereat, yet nothing they ſaid. And when the Duke and Maior ſaw this manner, they wiſely turned it to their purpoſe, and ſaid it was a goodly cry, and a ioyfull, to heare euery man with one voyce, no man ſaying nay: wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) ſince that we well perceiue that it is all your whole mindes to haue this Nobleman for your King, whereof wee ſhall make to his Grace ſo effectuall report, that wee doubt not but it ſhall redound vnto your great wealth, and commoditie: we require that to morrow you goe with vs, and wee with you vnto his noble Grace, to make our humble requeſt vnto him in manner before remembred. And therewith the Lords came downe, and the aſſembly diſſolued for the moſt part ſad, ſome with glad ſemblances, and yet not very merry, yea, and ſome that came with the Duke, not able to diſſemble their ſorrow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolour of their heart burſt out of their eyes.

(59) On the next morrow, the Maior with all the Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the Citie in their beſt array, aſſembling themſelues together, reſorted vnto Baynards Caſtle in Thames ſtreet, where the Protector lay. To which place repaired alſo according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diuers Noblemen with him, beſide many Knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke ſent word vnto the Lord Protector, of the being there of a great and honourable company, to moue a great matter vnto his Grace: whereupon the Protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if hee firſt knew ſome part of their errand, as though hee doubted, and partly diſtruſted the comming of ſuch a number vnto him ſo ſodainly, without any warning, or knowledge whether they came for good or harme; then the Duke when hee had ſhewed this vnto the Maior and other, that they might thereby ſee, how little the Protector looked for this matter; they then ſent vnto him by the Meſſenger ſuch louing meſſage againe, and therewith ſo humbly beſought him to vouchſafe, that they might reſort to his preſence, to propoſe their intent, which they would not impart to any other perſon; that at the laſt hee came out of his chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but ſtood aboue in a gallery ouer them, where they might ſee him and ſpeake to him, as though hee would not yet come too neare them, till he vnderſtood what they meant. And thereupon the Duke of Buckingham firſt made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his Grace would pardon them, and licenſe them to propoſe vnto his Grace, the intent of their comming without his diſpleaſure, without which pardon obtained, they durſt not be ſo bold to moue him in their ſuite. In which albeit they meant as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the Realme beſide; yet were they not ſure how his Grace would take it, whom they would in no wiſe offend. Then the Protector (as hee was very gentle of himſelfe selfe and also longed sore to know what they meant) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, verily trusting for the good minde that he bare them all, none of them would intend any thing to him-ward, wherewith he ought to be grieued.

(60) When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then waxed hee bold to shew him their entent and purpose, with-all the causes mouing them thereunto, as you haue heard before: and finally, to beseech his Grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodnesse and zeale vnto the Realme, now with his eye of pitty, to behold the long-continued distresse, and decay of the same, and to set his gratious hands to redresse an amendement thereof, by taking vpon him the Crowne and gouernment of the land; according to his right and title lawfully descended vnto him, and to the law of God, profit of the Realme, and vnto his grace so much the more honour, and lesse paine, in that, that neuer Prince raigned ouer any people that were so glad to liue vnder his obeisance, as the people of this land vnder his.

The Protector intreated to accept of the Crowne.

(61) When the Protector had heard the proposition, he looked very strangely thereat, and answered: That albeit it were, hee partly knew the things by them alleadged to be true, yet such intire loue he bare vnto King Edward and his children, that so much more he regarded his honor in other Realmes about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was neuer desirous, that he could not finde in his heart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other Nations where the truth was not well knowne, it would peraduenture be thought, that it was his owne ambitious minde and deuise to depose the Prince, and to take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie hee would not haue his honour stained for any Crowne, in which he had euer perceiued much more labour and paine, then pleasure to him that would so vse it, as hee that would not, were not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding hee not onely pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and harty fauour they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the Prince, vnder whom he was, and would bee content to liue, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as should like the King to vse him, he would doe his vttermost endeauour to set the Realme in good state, which was already in this little time of his Protectorship (the praise be giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before, occasion of the contrary, and of new intended to be, were now partly by good pollicy, partly more by Gods speciall prouidence, then mans prouision, represled.

The Protector saith nay, and would haue it.

(62) Vpon this answere giuen, the Duke by the Protectors license, a little rowned, aswell with other Noblemen about him, as with the Maior and Recorder of London. And after that, vpon like pardon desired and obtained, hee shewed aloude vnto the Protector for a finall conclusion, that the Realme was at a point, King Edwards line should not any longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, as it was now no surety to retreat, as for that they thought it was for the weale vniuersall to take that way, although they had not yet begunne it. Wherefore, if it would like his Grace to take the Crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto; if he would giue them a resolute answere to the contrary, which they would be loath to heare, then must they needs seeke, and would not faile to finde some other Nobleman that would. These words much moued the Protector, which elsе as euery man may know, would neuer of likelyhood haue inclined thereunto. But when he saw there was none other way, but that either he must take it, or else he, and his both goe from it, hee said vnto the Lords and Commons.

The Protector fauourably accepteth the Crowne.

(63) Sith wee well perceiue that all the Realme is so set, whereof we be very sorry, that they will not suffer in any wise King Edwards line to gouerne them, whom no earthly man can gouerne against their wils, and well wee also perceiue, that no man there is to whom the Crowne can by iust title appertaine, as to our selfe, as very right heire lawfully begotten of the body of our most deare Father Richard late Duke of Yorke, to which title is now ioyned your election, the Nobles and Commons of this Realme, which wee of all title possible take for the most effectuall: wee be content, and agree fauourably to incline to your petition and request, and according to the same, we here take vpon vs the royall estate, preheminence, and kingdome of the two noble Realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, by vs and our heires, to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other by Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe, and subdue, and establish for euer in due obedience vnto this Realme of England, the aduancement whereof we neuer aske of God longer to liue, then we intend to procure. With this there was a great shout, crying King Richard, King Richard. And then the Lords went vp to the King (for so was hee from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuersly of the matter, euery man as his fantasie gaue him.

Diuers opinions of the people.

(64) Much was talked and maruelled at the manner of this dealing, that the matter was made so strange vnto both parties, as though they neuer had communed either with others before, when as themselues wist there was no man so dull that heard them, but perceiued well inough, that all the matter was so made betweene them. Howbeit, some excused that againe, and said all must be done in good order: And men must sometimes for manners sake, not be acknowne what they know: for at the consecration of a Bishop, euery man wotteth well, by the paying for his Bulls, that he purposeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else, and yet must hee twice bee asked, whether hee will be a Bishop or no, and hee must twice say nay, and at the third time take it, as compelled thereunto by his owne will. And in a Stage-play, the people know right well, that he who plaieth the Sowdaine, is percase a sowter, yet if one should know so little good, to shew out of season what acquaintance hee hath with him, and call him by his owne name while he standeth in his Maiesty, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head worthily for marring of the play.

The Raigne and age of King Edward.

(65) The raigne of this young King may well be accounted an inter-regnum, without King, aswell for his minoritie, being vnder the rule of a Protector himselfe, as for the short time wherein he continued the name of a King; which onely was two moneths and sixteene daies, and in them also hee sate vncrowned, without Scepter or Ball, all which Richard aimed at, and perfidiously got, before they could come to his head; or into his hands. His age at the death of his Father, and entrance into his Throane, was eleauen yeares, fiue moneths, and fiue daies, and within three moneths after, was with his Brother smothered to death in the Tower of London, as shall bee shewed in his Raigne, of whom we are now by order of succession to write.

Tho. Woodſtocke ſmothered to death.

Richard, the third ſonne of Richard Duke of Yorke, borne at Fotheringhay Caſtle in the County of Northampton, was firſt honoured with the title of Glouceſter, being the third Duke of that number, and conſequently by vſurpation crowned King of England, the third of that name. A name indeed noted to the Kings ſo called, to be euer ominous; and the title of Glouceſter to thoſe Dukes euer fatall, all of both, dying violent and vntimely deaths, which ought to haue beene the more fearefull vnto Richard, now hauing poſſeſſion and intereſt in them both. But that not regarded, or deſtiny enforcing, his aſpiring minde gaue him no reſt, till his reſtleſſe body found it laſtly in the graue. For his brother deceaſed when his life was moſt deſired, no man in ſhew tooke his death ſo heauily as himſelfe, or tendered the young King with a more honourable reſpect, when as (God knowes) his minde ran vpon deepe reaches, how to compaſſe the Wreath for his owne head; which the better to faſhion, hee withdrew a while into the North, and at Yorke in moſt ſad and ſolemne manner obſerued the Funerals of the dead King: but howſoeuer the Maske couered this ſubtle Dukes face from the eye of the multitude; yet Buckingham well knew the ambitious deſire of his aſpiring heart, and indeed was the Dedalus that made him the wings, wherewith he mounted ſo neere vnto the Sunne, as that the wax melting (like the high-minded young Icarus) he caught his laſt fall.

(2) What

By Perſall, Buckingham ſecret ſeruant.

(2) What intendments they had before the Kings death, is vncertaine, though it may be ſuſpected: but ſure it is, he now gone, the Duke of Buckingham twice ſollicited Glouceſter by his meſſengers in the North, met him at Northampton himſelfe, accompanied him to London, forwarded him in Counſell, and was the firſt actor in this following tragedie. For, firſt making him Protector, procuring his young Nephew forth of Sanctuary, diſabling the young King, baſtardizing them both, perſwading the Citizens, working the Nobility: and all this done, to ſet the Crowne vpon crookt Richards head, and ſo moulded their mindes vnto the man, as they all became humble petitioners vnto him for to accept of the ſame, who in the meane-while had well-conned his owne part, by profuſe liberality, by paſſing-great grauity, by ſingular affability, by miniſtring of iuſtice, and by deepe and cloſe deuiſes, whereby he wonne to himſelfe the hearts of all, but the Lawyers eſpecially, to ſerue beſt his turne, which was ſo affected, that in the name of all the States of the Realme, a Petition was drawne and preſented him to accept the wearing of the Crowne: the true Copy whereof as we finde it recorded in the Parliament Roll, we haue inſerted, and is as followeth:

A Petition exhibited to the Protector to accept of the Crowne.

In Rotulo Parliamenti tenti apud Weſtm. die Veneris Viceſimo tertio die Ianuarij, An. Reg. Regis Richardi 3. primo inter alia continetur vt ſequitur.

Memorandum quod quadã billa exhibita fuit coram Domino Rege in Parliamento prædicto in hæc verba: Where late heretofore, that is to ſay, before the conſecration, coronation, and inthronization of our Soueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third, a roll of Parchment containing in writing certaine Articles of the Tenor vnder-written on the behalfe, and in the name of the three Eſtates of this Realme of England, that is to wit, of the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and of the Commons by name, and diuers Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other Nobles and notable perſons of the Commons in great multitude was preſented, and actually deliuered vnto our ſaid Soueraigne Lord, the intent and effect expreſſed at large in the ſame Roll: to the which Roll, and to the conſiderations, and inſtant petition comprized in the ſame, our ſaid Soueraigne Lord for the publique weale & tranquility of this Land, benignely aſſented. Now foraſmuch as neither the ſaid three Eſtates, neither the ſaid perſons which in their name preſented, and deliuered as it is aforeſaid, the ſaid Roll vnto our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, were aſſembled in forme of Parliament: by reaſon whereof, diuers doubts, queſtions, and ambiguities beene moued, and engendred in the mindes of diuers perſons, as it is ſaid: Therefore to the perpetuall memory of the truth, and declaration of the ſame, be it ordained, prouided, and eſtabliſhed in this preſent Parliament, that the Tenor of the ſaid Roll, with all the contents of the ſame, preſented as is abouеſaid, and deliuered to our foreſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, in the name & in the behalfe of the ſaid three Eſtates out of Parliament, now by the ſame three Eſtates aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, and by authority of the ſame be ratified, enrolled, recorded, approued, and authorized into remouing the occaſions of doubts and ambiguities, and to all other lawfull effects that ſhall now thereof enſue: So that all things ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired and remembred in the ſaid Roll, and in the Tenor of the ſame vnder-written, in the name of the ſaid three Eſtates, to the effect expreſſed in the ſame Roll be of the like effect, vertue, and force, as if all the ſame things had beene ſo ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired and remembred in a full Parliament, and by authority of the ſame accepted and approued. The Tenor of the ſaid Roll of Parchment, whereof aboue is made mention, followeth, and is ſuch.

All doubts taken away of King Richards election

The petition of the Kings election made lawfull, and authoriſed by Parliament.

To the high and Mighty Prince
Richard Duke of Glouceſter.

Pleaſe it your noble Grace to vnderſtand the conſiderations, election and petition vnder-written of vs, the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and Commons of this Realme of England, and thereunto agreeably to giue your aſſent to the common and publique weale of this Land, to the comfort and gladneſſe of all the people of the ſame. Firſt, wee conſider how that heretofore in time-paſſed, this Land many yeers ſtood in great proſperity, honour, and tranquilitie, which was cauſed, forſomuch as the King then raigning, vſed and followed the aduiſe and counſell of certaine Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other perſons of approued ſadneſſe, prudence, pollicy and experience, dreading God, and hauing tender zeale and affection to indifferent miniſtration of iuſtice, and to the common and publique weale of the Land: Then our Lord God was dread, loued and honoured, then within the Land was peace and tranquility, and among Neighbours concord and charity, then the malice of outward enemies was mightily reſiſted and repreſſed, and the Land honourably defended, with many great and glorious victories, then the entercourſe of Merchants was largely vſed and exerciſed: by which things aboue-remembred, the Land was greatly enriched, ſo that aſwell the Merchants and Artificers, as other poore people, labouring for their liuings in diuers occupations, had competent gaine, to the ſuſtentation of them and their houſholds, liuing without miſerable and intollerable pouerty: but afterward, when that ſuch as had the rule and gouernance of this Land, delighting in adulation and flattery, and led by ſenſuality and concupiſcence, followed the counſell of perſons inſolent, vicious, and of inordinate auarice, deſpiſing the counſell of good, vertuous, and prudent perſons, ſuch as aboue be remembred; The proſperity of this Land daily decreaſed, ſo that felicity was turned into miſery, and proſperity into aduerſity, and the order of policy and of the law of God and Man confounded, whereby it is likely this Realme to fall into extreame miſery and deſolation (which God defend) without due prouiſion of couenable remedy be had in this behalfe, in all goodly haſt.

The forme of the petition exhibited vnto the Protector.

Faire gloſes vpon foule pretenſes.

O time how doeſt thou turne, and art turned!

(3) Ouer this, among other things more ſpeciall, we conſider, how that the time of the raigne of King Edward the fourth late deceaſed, after the vngracious pretenſed marriage (as all England hath cauſe ſo to ſay) made betwixt the ſaid King Edward, and Elizabeth ſometimes wife to Sir Iohn Gray Knight, late naming her ſelfe, and many yeares heretofore Queene of England, the order of all politicke rule was peruerted, the lawes of God, and of Gods Church, and alſo the lawes of nature, and of England, and alſo of the laudable cuſtomes and liberties of the ſame, wherein euery Engliſh man is inheritor, broken, ſubuerted, and contemned, againſt all reaſon and iuſtice, ſo that the Land was ruled by ſelfe-will and pleaſure, feare and dread, all manner of equity and law laide apart and deſpiſed, whereof enſued many inconueniences and miſchiefes, as murthers, extortions, and oppreſſions, namely of poore and impotent people, ſo that no man was ſure of his life, land or liuelyhood, ne of his Wife, Daughter nor ſeruant, euery good maiden and woman ſtanding in dread to be rauiſhed and defloured: and beſides this, what diſcords, inward battels, effuſion of Chriſtian-mens bloud, and namely, by the deſtruction of the Nobles bloud of this Land, was had and committed within the ſame, it is euident and notary through all this Realme, vnto the great ſorrow and heauineſſe of all true Engliſhmen. And here alſo we conſider, how that the ſaid pretended marriage betwixt the aboue-named King Edward and Elizabeth Gray, was made of great preſumption without the knowing & aſſent of the Lords of this Land, and alſo by ſorcery and witchcraft committed by the ſaid Elizabeth, and her Mother Iaquet Dutcheſſe of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the publike voice and fame is through all this Land: and hereafter if the cauſe ſhall require, ſhall bee proued proued ſufficiently in time and place conuenient. And here alſo wee conſider how that the ſaid pretenſed marriage was made priuily and ſecretly, without edition of bancs, in a priuate chamber, a prophane place, and not openly in the face of the Church, after the Law of Gods Church, but contrary thereunto, and the laudable cuſtome of the Church of England. And how alſo that at the time of contract of the ſame pretended marriage, and before, and long time after, the ſaid King Edward was and ſtood married, and troth-plight to one Dame Eleanor Butler, daughter of the old Earle of Shrewsbury, with whom the ſame Edward had made a pre-contract of Matrimony, long time before he made the ſaid pretenſed marriage with the ſaid Elizabeth Gray, in manner and forme aforeſaid: which Premiſſes being true, as in very truth they been true: it appeareth, and followeth euidently, that the ſaid King Edward during his life, and the ſaid Elizabeth liued together ſinfully and damnably in adultery, againſt the law of God and of his Church: And therefore no maruell that the Soueraigne Lord, and the head of this Land, being of ſuch vngodly diſpoſition, and prouoking the ire and indignation of our Lord God; ſuch hainous miſchiefe and inconueniences as are aboue remembred, were vſed and committed in the Realme among the Subiects. Alſo it appeareth euidently, and followeth, that all the Iſſue and Children of the ſaid King Edward, beene baſtards, and vnable to inherite, or to claime any thing by inheritance, by the law and cuſtome of England.

(4) Moreouer, we conſider how that afterwards by the three Eſtates of this Realme aſſembled in Parliament, holden at Weſtminſter the 17. yeare of the Raigne of the ſaid King Edward the fourth, he then being in poſſeſſion of the Crowne and royall eſtate, by Act made in the ſame Parliament, George Duke of Clarence, Brother to the ſaid King Edward now deceaſed, was conuicted and attainted of high treaſon, as in the ſame Act is contained more at large, by cauſe and reaſon whereof, all the Iſſue of the ſaid George, was and is diſabled and barred of all right and claime that in any caſe they might haue or challenge by inheritance to the Crowne and dignity royall of this Realme, by the ancient law and cuſtome of this ſame Realme.

George Duke of Clarence and his heires made vncapable of the Crowne.

Ouer this, we conſider that ye be the vndoubted ſonne and heire of Richard late Duke of Yorke, very inheritor of the ſaid Crowne and dignity-royall, and as in right King of England by way of inheritance: and that at this time the premiſſes duely conſidered there is none other perſon liuing, but ye only that by right may claime the ſaid Crowne and dignity-royall by way of inheritance, and how that yee be borne within this Land; by reaſon whereof, as we deeme in our mindes, yee be more naturally inclined to the proſperity and Common-weale of the ſame: and all the three Eſtates of the Land haue and may haue more certaine knowledge of your birth and filiation aforeſaid. We conſider alſo the great wit, prudence, iuſtice, princely courage, and the memorable and laudable acts in diuers battels, which as we by experience know you heretofore haue done, for the ſaluation and defence of this ſame Realme; and alſo the great nobleneſſe and excellency of your birth and bloud, as of him that is deſcended of the three moſt royall houſes in Chriſtendome: that is to ſay, England, France, and Spaine: Wherefore theſe premiſſes by vs diligently conſidered, we deſiring effectually the peace, tranquility & weale publique of this Land, and the reduction of the ſame to the ancient honourable eſtate and proſperity, and hauing in your great prudence, iuſtice, princely courage, and excellent vertue, ſingular confidence, haue choſen in all that in vs is, and by this our writing chooſe you High and Mighty Prince our King and Soueraigne Lord, &c. To whom we know for certaine it appertaineth of inheritance ſo to be choſen. And hereupon wee humbly deſire, pray, and require your moſt noble Grace, that according to this election of vs the three Eſtates of this Land, as by your true inheritance, you will accept and take vpon you the ſaid Crowne and royall dignitie, with all things thereunto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging, aſwell by inheritance as by lawfull election: and in caſe yee ſo doe, wee promiſe to ſerue and aſſiſt your Highneſſe, as true and faithfull ſubiects, and liege-men; and to liue and die with you in this matter, and in euery other iuſt quarrell. For certainely, we be determined rather to aduenture and commit vs to the perill of our liues, and ieopardie of death, then to liue in ſuch thraldome and bondage as wee haue liued long time heretofore, oppreſſed and iniured by extortions, and new impoſitions, againſt the Law of God and man, and the liberty, old policy and Lawes of this Realme, wherein euery Engliſhman is inherited. Our LORD GOD, KING of all KINGS, by whoſe infinite goodnes and eternall prouidence all things beene principally gouerned in this world; lighten your ſoule, and grant you grace to doe as well in this matter as in all other, that may be according to his will and pleaſure, and to the common and publique weale of this Land: ſo that after great clouds, trouble, ſtormes, and tempeſts, the Sun of Iuſtice and of Grace may ſhine vpon vs, to the comfort and gladneſſe of all true-hearted Engliſhmen. Albeit, that the right, title, and eſtate, which our Soueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third hath to, and in the Crowne and royall dignity of this Realme of England; with all things thereunto within the ſame Realme, and without it vnited, annexed and appertaining, bin iuſt and lawfull, as grounded vpon the lawes of God, and of nature: and alſo vpon the ancient lawes and laudable cuſtomes of this ſaid Realme; and ſo taken and reputed by all ſuch perſons as beene learned in the aboue ſaid lawes and cuſtomes: Yet neuertheleſſe, foraſmuch as it is conſidered, that the moſt part of the people is not ſufficiently learned in the abouеſaid Lawes and cuſtoms, wherby the truth & right in this behalfe, of likelyhood may be hid, and not clearely knowne to all the people, & thereupon put in doubt and queſtion. And ouer this, how that the Court of Parliament is of ſuch authority, and the people of this Land of ſuch a nature and diſpoſition, as experience teacheth, that manifeſtation and declaration of any truth or right made by the three Eſtates of this Realme aſſembled in Parliament, and by the authoritie of the ſame, maketh before all other things moſt feith and certaine, and quieting of mens minds, remoueth the occaſion of all doubts, and ſeditious language. Therefore, at the requeſt, and by the aſſent of the three Eſtates of this Realme; that is to ſay, the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and Commons of this Land, aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, by authority of the ſame, be it pronounced, decreed, and declared, that our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King was, and is, the very vndoubted King of this Realme of England, with all things thereunto within the ſame Realme, and without it vnited, annexed, and appertaining, aſwell by right of Conſanguinity, and inheritance, as by lawfull election, conſecration, and coronation. And ouer this, that at the requeſt, and by the aſſent and authority aboue ſaid, be it ordained, enacted and eſtabliſhed, that the ſaid Crowne and royall dignity of this Realme, and the inheritance of the ſame, and all other things thereunto within the Realme, or without, is vnited, annexed, and now appertaining, reſt and abide in the perſon of our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, during his life, and after his deceaſe, in his heires of his body begotten; and in eſpeciall at the requeſt, and by aſſent and authority aboue ſaid, bee it ordained, enacted, eſtabliſhed, pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the high and excellent Prince Edward, ſon of our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, bee heire apparant of the ſame our Soueraigne Lord the King, to ſucceed to him in the aboue ſaid Crowne and royall dignity,

What cannot the Parliament effect, where all giue way to the sway of time?

(5) These things I haue laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Roll, that ye may vnderstand both what and how great matters the power of a Prince, the outward shew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, pensiue feare, desire of change, and goodly pretenses, are able to effect, in that most wise assembly of all the States of a Kingdome, euen against all law and right, so that the saying of Salomon in this State seemed most true, that a liuing dogge is better then a dead Lyon. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to haue been a Soueraigne, had he not beene a Soueraigne as Galba was reputed; who, when he was a Soueraigne, deceiued all mens expectation; but most worthy indeed of Soueraignty, had hee not beene transported with ambition (which blasted all his good parts) by lewd practises, and by mischieuous meanes, made foule way thereunto: for that by the common consent of all that are wise, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes; as indeed King Richard through his short time of raigne is accounted to haue beene.

King Richard like vnto Galba, a bad Subiect, but a good Prince.

(6) The Crowne and Scepter accepted as is said, King Richard vpon the twenty fifth of Iune, went in great pompe vnto Westminster hall, and there in the Kings-Bench Court tooke his Seat, saying, that hee would take vpon him the Crowne in that place, where the King himselfe ought to sit, whose chiefest duety was to administer Iustice to his people, and with a pleasing Oration so tickled the eares of his Auditors, that hee lulled the rurall to thinke that his like had neuer raigned in England; and to begin himselfe with a pretensed clemency, he pronounced pardon of all offences committed against him; for confirmation wherof, he sent for one Fogge, whom he deadly hated, who for feare of him had lately taken Sanctuary at Westminster, and there in sight of the people, with semblance accordingly, tooke him by the hand saying, that he would be thenceforth his assured in affection; whereat the Commons greatly reioyced, and with applauses extolled, though others wiser among them tooke it to be but fained, to serue his owne turne. And in his way homeward, whomsoeuer he met, he saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe to be guilty, is in a manner deiected to a seruile flattery.

King Richard accepteth the Crowne, and beginneth his raigne with great applause.

(7) King Richard, whose guilty heart was full of suspition, had sent for fiue thousand Souldiers out of the North to be present in London at his Coronation; these, vnder the leading of Robin of Ridsdale, came vp both euill apparrelled, and worse harnessed, in rusty Armour, neither defencible for proofe, nor scowred for shew: who mustering in Finesbury fields, were with disdaine gazed vpon by the beholders. But all things now ready for his Coronation (and much the sooner in that young Edwards prouision was conferred vpon his) vpon the fourth of Iuly, he with his Wife by water came to the Tower, where hee

(8) But Morton, Bishop of Ely, a firme man vnto King Edward, and vnpossible to be drawne vnto the disinheriting of his children, as was well perceiued by the Protector, among others, at the Councell held in the Tower, was left there prisoner, and accused of many great, but vnlikely treasons. This man borne in Dorsetshire, and brought vp in the Vniuersity of Oxford, was from a Doctor of the Arches made a priuy Councellor vnto King Henry, and after his death allured by King Edward to serue him, was sworne likewise of his Councell, and made one of the Executors of his will: whose insight into the intended designes, the Protector much feared, and therefore hauing him fast, minded so to keepe him, when hee released others laide in the Tower for the like feare. But the reuerence of the man, or vndeseruednesse of his wrongs, moued so the affection of the Oxford Academians, that they directed to the King (who professed much loue to that Vniuersity) a petitory Latine Epistle, no lesse eloquent and pithy, then circumspect and wary, wherein they thus pleaded for his liberty.

"(9) Though many important motiues wee "haue most Christian King, earnestly to recommend "to your princely clemency, the Reuerend Father "in Christ, the Lord Bishop of Elye, as being not "onely one of the most eminent Sonnes of our V- "niuersity, but also a singular Patrone and indul- "gent Father to vs all; yet could not these induce- "ments (howsoeuer very ponderous with all grate- "full mindes) perswade vs to become intercessors "for his pardon, but euer with due regard both to "your owne honour and safety; the greatnesse of "your princely fauours hauing more obliged vs, "then of any your royall Predecessors: whiles there- "fore wee stood in some doubt, how hee stood affe- "cted towards your Highnesse, wee held it an high "offence, if by tendring his safety, wee should any "way hazard yours: but now, vnderstanding that "his offence proceeded not of pertinacy, but hu- "mane frailety; and that he hath alwaies humbly "sued for pardon thereof, the bowels of our mo- "ther Vniuersity, like Rachel weeping ouer her "Children, were moued with compassion ouer the "deplored distresse of this her deerest sonne; where- "in yet (as wee hope) her affection deserues no iust "reprehension. (11) The next day with great pompe, ſtate and attendance of the Nobility, the King rode through London, ſo as a more royall had not beene ſeene at any Kings Coronation, for there attended him, three Dukes, nine Earles, two Viſcounts, twenty Lords, ſea-uenty eight Knights, all of them moſt richly furniſhed, whereof the Duke of Buckingham ſo farre exceeded, that the capariſon of his Horſe was ſo charged with embroydered worke of gold, as it was born vp from the ground by certaine his footemen thereto appointed. And contrary to my owne affections, or manner of my former proceedings, I will yet continue the moſt honourable offices performed at his royall enthroning with no little Admiration, how theſe Lords aſſembled to ſet the Crowne vpon the young Princes head, were ſo ſuddainely carried to Crowne his Protector, and that vpon ſuch falſe and ſlanderous pretences, as euery one of them ſaw his Title to be meerely an vniuſt vſurpation, but in them may be ſeene, that we are all the Sonnes of Adam, the Kings-Bench in the great Hall, from whence him-ſelfe and Queene vpon ray Cloth, both of them barefooted, went vnto King Edwards ſhrine in Saint *Pe-their degree, the trumpets and Heraulds marſhalling the way, the Croſſe with a ſolemne proceſſion followed, the Prieſts in fine ſurpleſſes and gray Amyſſes vpon them, the Biſhops and Abbots in rich Copes, all of them mytred, and carrying their Croſſes in their hands; next came the Earle of Huntington bearing a paire of gilt ſpurres, ſignifying Knighthood; after whom came the Earle of Bedford, who bare Saint came the Earle of Surrey, bearing the fourth ſword, vpon whoſe right hand went the Gentleman-Vſher

Lord Maior of London, with a Mace in his hand;
Next vnto whom went the Duke of Norfolke, bearing the Kings Crowne betwixt his hands, and then King Richard himſelfe came, in a Surcote and Robe of purple Veluet; hauing ouer his head a Canopie borne by the foure Barons of the fiue Ports, the Biſhop of Bath on his right hand, and of Durham on his left. The Duke of Buckingham bare the Kings traine, and to ſignifie the office of high Steward of England, hee bare a White Staffe in his hand.

whom was borne the Scepter, the Iuory Rod with the thereof a bell of gold. On her head ſhee ware a cir-mond* bearing her traine; the Dutcheſſe of Norfolke & Suffolke in their Coronets attendents, with twenty Ladies of Eſtate moſt richly attired. In this order they paſſed the Pallace into the Abbey, and aſcen-ding to the high Altar there ſhifted their Robes, and hauing other Robes open in diuers places from the middle vpward, were both of them annointed, and Crowned, he with Saint Edwards Crowne, hauing the Scepter deliuered into his left hand, and the Ball with the Croſſe, a token of Monarchie in his right; the Queene had a Scepter giuen into her right hand, and the Iuory Doue in her left; then after the Sacrament receiued (hauing the hoſt diuided betwixt them) they both offered at S. Edwards ſhrine,

and thus done, in the ſame Order and State as they came, returned to Weſtminſter-Hall, and there held a moſt Princely feaſt. Whereof let Hall and Graſton that there was nothing ſo plaine and openly proued,

For albeit the Barke of his begun aduentures, had without perill well paſſed the ſtraightes, and now got ſea-roome to ſpread ſaile at will; yet being vnder gale, and at fortunes diſpoſe, he feared the guſt of euery winde: at leaſt-wiſe ſuſpected that his young Nephewes liuing, would ſtay the courſe of his deepe reaches, as doth the little fiſh Remora, who holdeth (as at Anchor) the biggeſt ſhip vnder ſaile. His inward ſtudy therefore ſtill forged, howſoeuer his outward countenance was carryed, to cleare his paſſage by taking thoſe dangerous lets away, well knowing, that his little Nephewes enjoying their liues, men would be medling with their downe-caſt cauſe, and account him an Vſurper without all right to the Realme. To ſtop which ſtreame, no other courſe could he finde, but to cut off the currunt by which it ranne, as though the killing of his Kinſmen could better his bad claime, or vnkindly murther make him a kindly King. But being reſolued, he forthwith ſent one John Greene, a ſeruant in eſpeciall truſt, vnto Sir Robert Brakenburie Conſtable of the Tower, with a letter of credence, that the ſame Sir Robert ſhould in any wiſe put the two children to death.

King Richard his Letter to Sir Robert Brakenbury.

(16) This Greene thus poſted to London, deliuered his errand vnto Brakenbury, whom hee found kneeling at his Orizons before the Image of our Lady in the Tower, the buſineſſe being of ſuch weight as the King muſt be ſerued before hee had ended with his Saint. The Conſtable reading the Letter, and perceiuing the bloudy intent of the King, anſwered plainly, he would neuer put thoſe innocent babes vnto death, to dye therefore himſelfe. With which anſwere Iohn Greene returning, recounted the ſame to King Richard being at Warwicke, yet in his way to Glouceſter, wherewith he was maruellouſly perplexed, and thereat tooke ſuch diſpleaſure, that the ſame night hee ſaid to a ſecret Page of his: Ah whom ſhall a man truſt? thoſe that I haue brought vp my ſelfe, thoſe that I had weened would moſt ſurely ſerue mee, euen thoſe fayle mee, and at my commandement will doe nothing. Sir, quoth the Page, there lyeth one on your Pallet without, that I dare well ſay, to doe your Grace pleaſure, the thing were right hard that he would refuſe; meaning this by Sir Iames Tirrell, who was a man of a goodly Perſonage, and for Natures gifts worthy to haue ſerued a much better Prince, if he had wel ſerued God, and by grace obtained as much truth and good will, as he had ſtrength and wit.

The parts of Sir Iames Tirrell.

(17) The man had an high heart, and ſore longed vpward, not riſing yet ſo faſt as he hoped, being hindred and kept vnder by the meanes of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, who longing for no more partners of the Princes fauour, and namely, not for him, whoſe pride they knew would beare no Peere, kept him by ſecret drifts out of all ſecret truſt, which thing this Page had well marked and knowne: wherefore this occaſion offered of very ſpeciall friendſhip, he tooke his time to put him forward, and by ſuch wiſe to doe him good, that all the enemies he had, except the Diuell himſelfe could neuer haue done him ſo much hurt. For vpon this Pages words, King Richard aroſe (for this communication had he ſitting at the draught, a conuenient Carpet for ſuch a Counſell) and came out into a Pallet-Chamber, where he found in bed, Sir Iames and Sir Thomas Tirrels, of perſons much like, and Brethren in bloud, but nothing of kinne in conditions: Then ſaid the King merrily to them, what Sirs, be yee in bed ſo ſoone? and calling vp Sir Iames, brake to him ſecretly his minde in this miſchieuous matter, in which he found him nothing ſtrange. Wherefore on the morrow he ſent him to Brakenbury with a Letter, by which he was commanded to deliuer Sir Iames all the keyes of the Tower for one night, to the end he might accompliſh there the Kings pleaſure in ſuch things as he had giuen him in commandement. After which Letter deliuered, and the keyes receiued, Sir Iames appoynted the night next enſuing to deſtroy them, deuiſing before, and preparing the meanes.

Sir Iames ready to fulfil the Kings mind in the murther of the Princes.

(18) The Prince in the Tower ſlenderly attended; and altogether neglected by the Nobility, laſtly, had newes that his Vncle had left the name of Protector, and taken vpon him the Title of King, who with full conſent of the Lords was to be crowned within a few daies following, with the ſame Crowne, and in the like eſtate as had beene prouided for his ſolemnitie, whereat the dejected innocent ſighed and ſaid; Alaſſe, I would my Vncle would let mee enjoy my life yet, though I loſe both my Kingdome and Crowne. Which words he pronounced with ſuch a feeling feare, as much moued the Relater to pitty, and to perſwade him with the beſt comforts he could: but forthwith the Prince and his Brother were both ſhut vp, and all attendants remoued from them, onely one called Black-Will, or William Slaughter excepted, who was ſet to ſerue them, and ſee them ſure. After which time the Prince neuer tyed his poynts, nor cared for himſelfe, but with that young Babe his Brother lingered with thought and heauineſſe, till their traiterous deaths deliuered them out of that wretchednеſſe: for the execution whereof, Tirrell appoynted Miles Forreſt, one of the foure that kept them, a fellow fleſhed in murther before-time: To whom he joyned one Iohn Dighton his Horſe-keeper, a bigge, broad, ſquare knaue.

Sir Th. Moore.

(19) About mid-night (all others being remoued from them,) this Miles Forreſt, and Iohn Dighton, came into the Chamber, and ſuddenly wrapped vp the ſeely children in the Bed-clothes, where they lay, keeping by force the Feather-bed and pillowes hard vpon their mouthes that they were therein ſmothered to death, and gaue vp to God their innocent ſoules into the joyes of Heauen, leauing their bodies vnto the Tormentors dead in the Bed: which after theſe monſtrous wretches perceyued, firſt by the ſtrugling with the paines of death, and after long lying ſtill to be throughly diſpatched, they laide their bodies naked out vpon the Bed, and then fetched Sir Iames, their inſtigator, to ſee them, who cauſed theſe murtherers to bury them at the ſtaires foot, ſomewhat deepe in the ground, vnder a great heape of ſtones. Then rode Sir Iames in haſte to the King, vnto whom he ſhewed the manner of their death, and place of buriall, which newes was ſo welcome to his wicked heart, as he greatly reioyced, and with great thankes dubbed (as ſome hold) this his mercileſſe Inſtrument, Knight. But the place of their buriall he liked not, ſaying, that vile corner ſhould not containe the bodies of thoſe Princes, his Nephewes, and commanded them a better place for buriall, becauſe they were the ſons of a King. Whereupon the Prieſt of the Tower tooke vp the bodies; and ſecretly interred them in ſuch place, which by the occaſion of his death could neuer ſince come to light.

Their bodies were buried vnder a paire of ſtaires.

(20) The continuer of Iohn Harding tels vs, from the report of others, that King Richard cauſed Sir Robert Brakenburies Prieſt to cloſe their dead corps in lead, and ſo to put them in a coffin full of holes, and hooked at the ends with two hookes of Iron, and ſo to caſt them into a place called the Blacke-deepes at the Thames mouth, whereby they ſhould neuer riſe vp, or be any more ſeene. Whereſoeuer they were buried, thus they died, and by theſe murtherers. For very certaine it is, and well knowne, that at ſuch time as Sir Iames Tirrell was in the Tower, for Treaſon committed againſt King Henry the ſeauenth, both Dighton and he were examined, and confeſſed the murther in manner as is ſaid, but whether their bodies were remoued they could not ſay. And thus as I haue learned of them that knew much, and little cauſe had to lye, were theſe two noble Princes, theſe innocent tender children, borne of moſt royall bloud, brought vp in great wealth, likely to haue liued, to haue raigned, and ruled in the Realme, by traiterous tyranny taken, depriued of their eſtates, ſhortly ſhut vp in prison, and impiously murdered, and the body cast out God wot where, by the cruell ambition of their vnnaturall Vncle, and his hellish Tormentors. Which things on euery part well pondered; God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neither in what vnsurety standeth this worldly weale, or what mischiefe worketh the proud enterprise of an high heart, or finally, what wretched end ensueth such barbarous cruelty.

Gods justice and reuenge vpon the murtherers.

(20) For first to begin with the Ministers, Miles Forrest, at S. Martins, peece-meale rotted away; Sir Iames Tyrrell died at Tower-hill for Treason; Dighton indeed walketh on aliue in good possibility to be hanged ere he die, liuing at Callis no lesse distained and hated then pointed at of all. King Richard himselfe as yee shall hereafter heare, was slaine in the field, hacked and hewed of his enemies hands, carried on horse-backe dead, his haire in despite torne and tugged like a Curre dogge: and the mischiefe that he tooke was within lesse then three yeares of the mischiefe that he did, and yet all the meane time spent in much paine and trouble outward, and much feare, anguish, and sorrow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his Chamberlaine, that after this abhominable deede done, he neuer had quiet in his minde: hee neuer thought himselfe sure: but where he went abroad, his eyes euer whirled about, his body priuily fenced, his hand euer on his dagger, his countenance and manner like one alwaies readie to strike againe, he tooke ill rest a nights, lay long waking and musing, sore wearied with care and watch, rather slumbred then slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, suddainely sometimes start vp, leapt out of his Bed, and ranne about the Chamber, so was his restlesse heart continually tossed and tumbled with the teadious impression and stormy remembrance of his abhominable deed. Neither had he in his best, any time of quiet, for immediately began the conspiracy (or rather good consideration) betweene the Duke of Buckingham, and diuers other Gentlemen against him.

(21) Which Duke as soone as Glouceſter vpon the death of King Edward came to Yorke, sent thither in secret wise a trusty seruant of his, named Persall, to assure him, that he would take his part in this his new world, and if need were, would waite vpon him with a thousand good-fellowes: and againe sent offers of the like vnto Nottingham, whither the Protector from Yorke, with many Gentlemen of the North Countrey was come, and on his way to London-ward in secret manner met him himselfe, but at Northampton openly with three hundred horse: and from thence still continued with him, being a partner of all his deuises, till that after his coronation they departed (as it seemed) very great friends at Glouceſter: from whence as soone as the Duke came home, he so lightly turned from him, and so highly conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And surely the occasion of their variance is of diuers men, diuersely reported; Some haue said, that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other things, required of the Protector, the Duke of Hertfords Lands, to the which he pretended himselfe just inheritor. And forasmuch as the Title which he claimed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the title of the Crowne, by the line of King Henry before depriued, the Protector conceiued such indignation, that he rejected the Dukes request, with many spightfull and minatory wordes, which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust, that he neuer after could indure to looke aright on King Richard, but euer feared his owne life, so farre forth, that when the Protector rode through London towards his Coronation, he fained himselfe sicke, because he would not ride with him: And the other taking it in euill part, sent him word to rise, and come ride, or he would make him to be carried. Whereupon hee rode on with an euill will, and that notwithstanding, on the morrow rose from the Feast, faining himselfe sick, whereat King Richard said, it was done in hatred and despite of him. And they say, that euer after continually each of them liued in such hatred and distrust of other, as the Duke verily looked to haue beene murthered at Glouceſter: from which neuertheless he in faire manner departed. But surely some right secret, at this day, deny this: and many right wise men thinke it vnlikely (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and what need in that greene world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke stood, if he fell once in suspition of the Tyrant) that either the Protector would giue the Duke occasion of displeasure, or the Duke the Protector occasion of mistrust. And verily men thinke, that if King Richard had any such conceiued opinion, he would neuer haue suffered the Duke to haue escaped his hands.

The feares of the Duke of Buckingham.

No such suspition betwixt the King and the Duke as was said to be.

(22) The very truth is, Buckingham was an high-minded man, and could euill beare the glory of another; so that I haue heard of some that saw it, that the Duke at such time as the Crowne was first set vpon the Protectors head, his eye could not abide the sight thereof, but wried his face another way. But men say, that he was of truth not well at ease, which to King Richard was well knowne, and nothing ill taken, nor any demand of the Dukes vncourteously rejected, but he both with great gifts and high behests, in most louing and trusty manner, departed at Glouceſter. But soone after his comming home to Brecknock, hauing there in custody by the commandement of King Richard, Doctor Morton Bishop of Ely, who (yee before heard) was taken in the counsell at the Tower, waxed with him familiar: whose wisedome abused his pride to his owne deliuerance, and the Dukes destruction.

The diuers opinions of the King and Dukes falling out.

(23) This Bishop was a man of great naturall wit; very well learned, and honourable in behauiour, lacking no wise waies to win fauour: he had beene fast vpon the part of King Henry, while that part was in wealth; and naytheleſſe left it not, nor forsooke it in woe, but fled the Realme with Queene Margaret and Prince Edward, while King Edward had Henry in prison, and neuer came home but to the field. After which lost, and that side vtterly subdued, the other for his fast faith and wisedome not onely was content to receiue him, but also wooed him to come, and had him from thence-forth both in great secret trust, and very speciall fauour, which hee nothing deceiued. For hee being (as you haue heard) after King Edwards death, first taken by the Tyrant for his truth to the King, found the meanes to set this Duke in his top, joyned Gentlemen together in ayde of Earle Henry, deuising first the marriage betweene him and King Edwards Daughter: by which his faith, he declared the good seruice to both his masters at once, with infinite benefit to the Realme, by the conjunction of those two blouds in one; whose seuerall Titles had long time disquieted the Land; he fled the Realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world, till the noble Prince King Henry the seauenth got him home againe, made him Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellour of England, whereunto the Pope joyned the honour of a Cardinall. Thus liuing many dayes in as much honour as one man might well wish, ended them so godly, that his death with Gods mercy, well changed his life.

out, if the matter were well handled: hee craftily ſought the wayes to pricke him forward, taking alwayes the occaſion of his comming, and keeping himſelfe ſo cloſe within his bounds, that he rather ſeemed to follow then to leade him. For when the Duke firſt began to praiſe and boaſt of the King, and ſhew how much profit the Realme ſhould take by his raigne; Morton anſwered thus: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lye, for if I would ſweare the contrary, your Lordſhip would not ween I beleeue, but that if the World would haue gone, as I could haue wiſhed, King Henries ſon had had the Crowne, and not King Edward. But after that God had ordered him to loſe it, and King Edward to raigne, I was neuer ſo mad, that I would with a dead man ſtriue againſt a quicke. So was I to King Edward a faithfull Chaplaine, and glad would haue beene that his Childe ſhould haue ſucceeded him. Howbeit, if the ſecret judgement of God haue otherwiſe prouided, I purpoſe not to ſpurne againſt the pricke, nor labour to ſet vp, that God putteth downe. And as for the late Protector and now King, and euen there he left: ſaying, that he had already medled too much with the world, and would from that day meddle with his Booke, and his Beades, and no further.

(24) Then longed the Duke ſore to heare what he would haue ſaid, becauſe he ended with the King, and there ſo ſuddainly ſtopped, and exhorted him ſo familiarly, betweene them twaine, to be bolde to ſay whatſoeuer he thought, whereof he faithfully promiſed there ſhould neuer come hurt, and peraduenture more good then he would weene, and that himſelfe intended to vſe his faithfull, ſecret, aduiſe and counſell, which he ſaid was the onely cauſe for which he procured of the King to haue him in his cuſtody, where he might account himſelfe at home, and elſe had he beene put in the hands of them with whom he ſhould not haue found the like fauour. The Biſhop right humbly thanked him and ſaid: In good faith my Lord, I loue not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault. Foraſmuch as it ſhall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaſeth the Prince to conſtrue it. And euer I thinke on Æſops tale, that when the Lyon had proclaimed vpon paine of death there ſhould no horned Beaſt abide in the Wood, one that had in his fore-head a bunch of fleſh, fled away a great pace. The Foxe who ſaw him runne ſo faſt, asked him whether he made all that haſte? and he anſwered, In faith, I neither wot, nor recke, ſo I were once hence, becauſe of this Proclamation made againſt horned Beaſts. What foole (quoth the Foxe) thou maiſt abide well enough, the Lyon meant not thee, for it is no horne that is in thy head. No marry (quoth he) that wot I well enough, but what if he call it a horne, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrily at the tale, and ſaid, my Lord I warrant you, neither the Lyon nor the Boare ſhall picke any matter at any thing here ſpoken, for it ſhall neuer come to their eares. In good faith Sir, ſaid the Biſhop, if it did, the thing that I was about to ſay, (taken as well as afore God I meant it) could deſerue but thankes; and yet taken as I weene it would, might happely turne me to little good, and you to leſſe. Then longed the Duke yet more to wit what it was; whereupon the Biſhop ſaid, in good faith my Lord, as for the late Protector, ſith he is now King in poſſeſſion, I purpoſe not to diſpute his title, but for the weale of this Realme, whereof his Grace hath now the gouernance, and my ſelfe am a poore member, I was about to wiſh, that to thoſe good abilities, whereof he hath already right many, little needing my praiſe; it might yet haue pleaſed God for the better ſtore, to haue giuen him ſome of ſuch other excellent vertues meete for the rule of a Realme as our Lord hath planted in the perſon of your Grace: and there left againe.

The deſire of the Duke to know his meaning.

(25) The Duke ſomewhat maruailing at his ſuddaine pauſes: ſaid, My Lord, I note your often breathings and ſuddaine ſtopping in your communication; ſo that to my intelligence, your words neither come to any direct or perfect ſentence in concluſion, whereby either I might haue knowledge what your intent is now towards the King, or what affection you beare towards mee. For the compariſon of good qualities aſcribed to vs both, maketh mee not a little to muſe, thinking that you haue ſome other priuy imagination imprinted in your heart, which you be abaſhed to diſcloſe, and ſpecially to me, which on my honour doe aſſure you to be as ſecret in this caſe as the deafe and dumbe perſon to the ſinger, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Biſhop being ſomewhat bolder, conſidering the Dukes p[romiſe], but moſt of all animated, becauſe hee k[new] the Duke deſirous to be magnified, and alſo he p[er]ceyued the inward hatred which he bare towards King Richard, he opened his ſtomacke to the bottome, and ſaid: My ſingular good Lord, ſith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your Graces cuſtodie, I may rather call it a libertie, then a ſtraite impriſonment, in auoyding of idleneſſe, Mother of all vices, in reading Bookes and ancient Pamphlets, I haue found this ſentence written, that no man is borne free and at liberty of himſelfe onely: for one part of ducty he oweth to his Parents, another part to his friends and kindred; but the natiue Countrey in the which he firſt taſted this pleaſant and flattering World, demandeth a debt not to be forgotten. Which ſaying, cauſeth mee to conſider in what caſe the Realme, my natiue Countrey, now ſtandeth; and in what eſtate and aſſurance before this time it hath continued; what Gouernour we now haue, and what Ruler we might haue; for I plainely perceiue (the Realme being in this caſe) muſt needes decay, and be brought to confuſion: but one hope I haue, that is, when I conſider your noble Perſonage, your juſtice and indifferencie, your feruent zeale, and ardent loue towards your naturall Countrey; and in like manner, the loue of your Countrey towards you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and eloquence, which ſo much doth abound in your perſon; I muſt needes thinke this Realme fortunate, which hath ſuch a Prince in ſtore, meete and apt to be Gouernour. But on the other ſide, when I call to memory the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called King, ſo violated by tyranny, ſo altered by vſurped authoritie, and ſo clouded by blind ambition, I muſt needes ſay, that he is neither meete to be King of ſo noble a Realme, nor ſo famous a Realme meete to be gouerned by ſuch a Tyrant. Was not his firſt enterprize to obtaine the Crowne, begun by the murther of diuers Perſonages? did hee not ſecondarily proceed againſt his owne naturall mother; declaring her openly to be a woman giuen to carnall affection and diſſolute liuing? declaring furthermore, his two Brethren, and two Nephewes, to be Baſtards, and to be borne in adultery? yet not contented, after hee had obtayned the Garland, he cauſed the two poore innocents his Nephewes, committed to him, to be moſt ſhamefully murthered: the bloud of which little Babes daily cry to God from the earth for vengeance. What ſurety can be in this Land to any perſon, eyther for life or goods, vnder ſuch a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the deſtruction of his owne bloud, and much leſſe the loſſe of others? But now to conclude, what I meane towards your noble perſon, I ſay and affirme, if you loue God, your linage, or your natiue Countrey, you muſt your ſelfe take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the ſame, as alſo for the deliuerance of your naturall Country-men from the bondage of ſuch a Tyrant. And if your ſelfe will refuſe to take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, then I adjure you by the faith you owe vnto God, to deuiſe ſome wayes how this Realme may be brought to ſome conuenient Regiment, vnder ſome good Gouernour. ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a great while, so that night they communed no more.

The next daies conference.

(26) The next day the Duke sent for the Bishop, to whom he said, My Lord of Ely, I must needs in heart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you be a sure friend, a trusty counsellor, and a very louer of your Countrey. And sith that at our last communication, you haue disclosed the secrets of your heart touching the now Vsurper of the Crowne, and also haue a little touched the aduancement of the two noble Families of Yorke and Lancaster, I shall likewise declare vnto you my priuy intents and secret cogitations. And to begin, when King Edward was deceased, I then began to study, and with deliberation to ponder in what manner this Realme should be gouerned: I perswaded with my selfe to take part with the Duke of Glouceſter, whom I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without injurie, and so by my meanes he was made Protector both of the King and realme; which authority being once gotten, he neuer ceased priuily to require mee and other Lords, as well spirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twenty yeares, and were able to gouerne the Realme as a sufficient King: which thing, when he saw me somewhat sticke at, he then brought in instruments, authenticke Doctors, Proctors, and Notaries of the Law, with depositions of diuers witnesses, testifying King Edwards Children to be Bastards: which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to be fained. When the said depositions were before vs read, and diligently heard, he stood vp bare-headed, saying: Well my Lords, euen as I and you would that my Nephewes should haue no wrong: so I pray you doe mee nothing but right, for these witnesses and sayings of famous Doctors be true: For I am onely the vndubitate heire to Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, adjudged to be the very heire to the Crowne of this Realme by authority of Parliament. Which things so by learned men for veritie to vs declared, caused me and others to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted Prince, and Soueraigne Lord. So againe, by my ayde, he of a Protector was made a King: but when he was once crowned King, and in full possession of the Realme, he cast away his olde conditions. For, when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the Earle of Hertfords Lands, which his Brother Edward wrongfully detained from mee, and also required to haue the office of the high Constableship of England, as diuers of my noble Ancestors before this time haue had, & in long discent continued; In this my first suite, he did not onely first delay mee, and afterwards deny me, but gaue me such vnkinde words, as though I had neuer furthered him: all which I suffered patiently. But when I was informed of the death of the two young Innocents, O Lord, my heart inwardly grudged, insomuch as I abhorred the sight of him; I tooke my leaue of the Court, and returned to Brecknocke to you, but in my journey as I came, I had diuers imaginations how to depriue this vnnaturall Vncle. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the Crowne, now was the way made plaine, and occasion giuen. For I well saw he was disdained of the Lords Temporall, and accursed of the Lords Spirituall. After diuers cogitations of this matter, as I rode betweene Worceſter and Bridgenorth, I encountred with the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, now wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the very daughter, and sole heire to Iohn Duke of Sommerset, my Grand-fathers elder Brother, so that she and her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond be both betweene me and the gate, to enter into the Majesty-royall, and getting of the Crowne; and when we had a little communed concerning her Son, and were departed, I then began to dispute with my selfe, whether I were best to take it vpon me, by the election of the Nobility and Communalty, or to take it by power. Thus standing in a wauering ambiguity, I considered first, the office, duety, and paine of a King, which surely I thinke that no mortall man can justly and truely obserue, except he be elected of God, as King Dauid was.

(27) But further I remembred, that if I once tooke vpon mee the Gouernance of the Realme, the Daughters of King Edward, and their Allies, being both for his sake much beloued, and also for the great injurie done to them much pitied, would neuer cease to barke at the one side of me. Semblably my Cosin the Earle of Richmond, his aydes and kinsfolkes will surely attempt either to bite, or to pierce mee on the other side, so that my life and rule should euer hang vnquiet in doubt of death or deposition: And if the said two Linages of Yorke and Lancaster should joyne in one against me, then were I surely matched. Wherefore I haue clearely determined vtterly to relinquish all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the Crowne. For, as I tolde you, the Countesse of Richmond in my returne from the new-named King, meeting mee in the high way, prayed mee first for kindreds sake, secondly for the loue I bare to my Grand-father Duke Humfrey, who was sworne-brother to her father, to moue the King to be good to her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond, and to license him with his fauour to returne againe into England, and if it were his pleasure so to doe, she promised that the Earle her Sonne should marry one of the Kings Daughters at the appoyntment of the King, without any thing demanded for the said espousals, but onely the Kings fauour, which request I soone ouer-passed, and departed. But after in my lodging I called to memory more of that matter, and now am bent, that the Earle of Richmond, heire of the House of Lancaster, shall take to Wife Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward, by the which marriage both the Houses of Yorke and Lancaster may be vnited in one.

The communication of the Countesse of Richmond with the Duke of Buckingham.

Henry Earle of Richmond and Lady Elizabeth must make the vnion.

(28) When the Duke had said, Bishop Morton who euer fauoured the House of Lancaster, was wondrous joyfull, for all his imagination tended to this effect; and lest the Dukes courage should asswage, or his minde alter, he said to the Duke: My Lord of Buckingham, sith by Gods prouision, and your incomparable wisdome, this noble conjunction is first moued, it is necessary to consider what persons we shall first make priuy of this politique conclusion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with my Ladie of Richmond the Earles Mother, which knoweth where he is in Britaine: sith you will begin that way (said the Bishop) I haue an old friend with the Countesse, called Reinald Bray, for whom I shall send, if it be your pleasure: so the Bishop wrote for him to come to Brecknocke, who straite came backe with the messenger, where the Duke and Bishop declared what they had deuised for the preferment of the Earle of Richmond, sonne to his Lady and Mistresse: willing her first to compasse how to obtaine the good will of Queene Elizabeth, and also of her eldest daughter: and after secretly to send to her Son in Britaine, to declare what high honour was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marry the Lady Elizabeth assoone as he was King of the Realme. With which conclusion, Reinold Bray, with a glad heart, returned to the Counteſſe his Lady. Bray thus departed, the Bishop told the Duke, that if he were in his Isle of Ely, he could make many friends to further their enterprise. The Duke knew this to be true, but yet loth to lose the societie of such a Counsellor, gaue him faire words, saying, he should shortly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies, but the Bishop ere the Dukes company were assembled, secretly disguised, in a night departed and came to Ely, where he found money and friends, and then sailed into Flaunders, where he did the Earle of Richmond good seruice.

Lewis a Phyſitian another inſtrument.

wherefore ſhee deuiſed a meanes how to breake this matter to Queene Elizabeth, being then in Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, and hauing in her family a certaine Welſhman called Lewis, learned in Phyſicke, now hauing opportunity to breake her minde vnto him, declared that the time was come, that her Sonne ſhould be joyned in marriage with Lady Elizabeth, daughter and heire to King Edward: and that King Richard ſhould out of all honour and eſtate be dejected, and required him to goe to Queene Elizabeth not as a meſſenger, but as one that came friendly to viſite her, and as time and place ſhould ſerue to make her priuy of this deuiſe. This Phyſitian with good diligence repayred to the Queene, and when he ſaw time conuenient, ſaid vnto her: Madame, although my imagination be very ſimple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am ſo bold to vtter vnto you a ſecret conceit, which I haue compaſſed in my braine. When I remember the great loſſe which you haue ſuſtained by the death of your louing Husband, and the great ſorrow that you haue ſuffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no leſſe doe, then daily ſtudy how to bring your heart to comfort, and alſo to reuenge the quarrell of you and your children, on that cruell Tyrant King Richard. And firſt conſider what battell, and what miſchiefe haue riſen by the diſſention betweene the two Houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter, which two families if they may be joyned in one, I doubt not but that your line ſhall be againe reſtored to your great joy and comfort: You know, Madame, that of the houſe of Lancaſter, the Earle of Richmond is next of bloud, & to the houſe of Yorke your daughters now are heires. If you could deuiſe the meanes how to couple your eldeſt daughter with the Earle of Richmond in matrimony, no doubt, but that the Vſurper ſhould ſhortly be depoſed, and your heire againe to her right reſtored.

Lewis breaketh the intent vnto Queene Elizabeth.

(30) When the Queene had heard this friendly Motion, ſhe inſtantly beſought him, that as he had beene the firſt inuentor of ſo good an enterpriſe, that now he would not deſiſt to follow the ſame, requiring him further, that he would reſort to the Counteſſe of Richmond, mother to the Earle Henry, and to declare to her on the Queenes behalfe, that all the friends of King Edward her Husband, ſhould aſſiſt and take part with the Earle of Richmond her ſonne, ſo that he would take an oath, that after the Kingdome obtayned, to eſpouſe the Lady Elizabeth her daughter, &c. M. Lewis ſo ſped his buſineſſe, that he made a finall end of this buſineſſe, betweene the two mothers: ſo the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, brought to a good hope of the preferment of her Sonne, made Reinold Bray chiefe ſoliciter of this conſpiracy, giuing him in charge ſecretly to inueagle ſuch perſons of Nobility to joyne with her, and take her part, as he knew to be faithfull.

Queene Elizabeth readily receiueth the motion.

The Queene ſendeth to the Counteſſe.

The two mothers agreede vpon the vnion.

(31) This Reinold Bray within few daies brought to his luer Sir Giles Daubeny, Sir Iohn Cheinie, Knights, Richard Guilford, and Thomas Ramney Eſquiers, and others. In the meane while, the Counteſſe of Richmond ſent one Chriſtopher Vrſewicke, a Prieſt into Britaine, to the Earle of Richmond her Sonne, to declare to him all the agreements betweene her and the Queene agreede: and withall to ſhew him that the Duke of Buckingham was one of the firſt Inuenters of this enterpriſe: ſhe likewiſe ſent Hugh Conway an Eſquire into Britaine, with a great ſumme of mony, giuing him in charge to declare to the Earle, the great loue that the moſt part of the Nobility of the Realme bare towards him, willing him not to neglect ſo good an occaſion offered, but with all ſpeed to ſettle his minde how to returne into England, and therewithall aduiſing him to take Land in Wales. When the Earle had receiued this joyfull meſſage, he brake to the Duke of Britaine all his ſecrets, aduertiſing him that he was entred into a ſure and ſtedfaſt hope to obtaine the Crown of England, deſiring him of help towards the atchieuing of his enterpriſe, which the Duke promiſed, and afterwards performed: whereupon the Earle ſent back againe Hugh Conway, & Th. Ramney to declare his comming ſhortly into England.

Hugh Conway ſent into Britaine.

(32) In the meane ſeaſon the chiefe of the conſpiracy in England, began many enterpriſes, which being neuer ſo priuily handled, yet knowledge thereof came to King Richard, and becauſe he knew the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head, and aide of this combination, he thought it moſt neceſſary to plucke him from that part, and thereupon addreſſed his louing Letters vnto the Duke, requeſting him moſt earneſtly to come to the Court, whoſe graue aduiſe for counſell hee then ſtood much in need of; with many words of kinde complements to be vttered from the mouth of the meſſenger: but the Duke miſtruſting thoſe ſweet promiſes proceeded out of a bitter intent, and knowing King Richard to ſpeake moſt fayreſt when he meant fouleſt play, deſired the King of pardon, excuſing himſelfe that he was ſickly, and not well able to trauell: which excuſe the King would not admit, but ſent other Letters with checking words, commanding him without delay to repaire to his preſence: vnto which the Duke made a determinate anſwere that he would not come to his mortall enemy: and immediately prepared warre againſt him. Whereupon, Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet came out of Sanctuary, and gathered a great band of men in the County of Yorke, Sir Edward Courtney and Peter his Brother, Biſhop of Exceſter, raiſed another Army in Deuonſhire and Cornwall, and in Kent, Sir Richard Guilford, and other Gentlemen raiſed a Company, and all this was done euen in one moment.

The Duke of Buckingham refuſeth to come to the Court.

Commotions begun.

(33) King Richard rouzed from his pleaſures in progreſſe, ſent forth commiſſion to muſter his men, and with a great preparation from London marched towards Salisbury, thinking it not beſt to diſparkle his power into ſmall parts in purſuing his enemies euery way at once, and therefore omitting all others, with a great puiſſance went to ſet vpon the Duke of Buckingham, the head of the ſpring. The Duke hearing of the Kings approach, made out to meete him before he came too farre, accompanied with a great power of wilde Welſhmen, whom he had enforced to follow him, more by his Lordly commandement, then by liberall wages, which thing indeed was the cauſe that they fell off, and forſooke him. His march was through the Forreſt of Deane, intending for Gloceſter, where he meant to paſſe Seuerne, and ſo haue joyned his Army with the Courtneys, and other Weſterne men, which had he done, no doubt King Richard had been in great jeopardie. But before he could attaine the Seuerne ſide, by force of continuall raine the Riuer roſe ſo high, that it ouerflowed all the Country adjoyning, and was not again bounded within his owne bankes for the ſpace of ten daies, ſo that the Duke could not get ouer, nor his Complices any wiſe come vnto him, during which time the Welſhmen lingring idle, without wages, or victuall, ſuddainely brake vp Campe, and departed; whereupon the Duke was wonderouſly perplexed, not knowing how to recouer this vnfortunate chance, and deſtitute of power to ſhew himſelfe in field, ſought to ſecure himſelfe in ſecret, till deſtiny aſſigned him a better day.

Great matters letted that the complices could not joyne.

(34) A ſeruant he had in eſpeciall fauour and truſt, brought vp tenderly by him, and riſen to great wealth and eſteeme, his name was Humfrey Baniſter, and place of reſidence neere vnto Shrewsburie, whither the diſtreſſed Duke in diſguiſe repayred, intending there to remaine ſecret, vntill he might eyther raiſe a new power, or elſe by ſome meanes conuay himſelfe vnto Britaine to Henry Earle of Richmond: but as ſoone as the others which had attempted the ſame enterpriſe againſt the King, had knowledge that Buckingham was forſaken of his Company, and could not be found, as men ſtrucke in ſodaine feare ſhifted euery one for himſelfe, many of them taking Sanctuarie, but the moſt of the chiefeſt tooke into

Many fled into Britaine to Earle Henry.

A proclamation for the apprehenſion of the Duke of Buckingham.

(35) Richard thus farre proceeded, and no enemy ſeene, his hopes were encreaſed, and feares daily leſſe; yet being a Prince politique and vigilant, he commanded the Ports to be ſecurely kept, and knowing that Buckingham was not fled with the reſt, made Proclamation for the apprehending of that Duke, promiſing a thouſand pound to the man that could bring him forth, with pardon of his faults, to enjoy the Kings fauour, and if he were a Bond-man, preſently to be made free. Baniſter minding the preſent, and forgetting what was paſt, ſpread his lap firſt to receiue this golden ſhower, and in hope of this gaine, made no conſcience to betray his owne Lord, who had now laide his life vpon truſt in his hands: hee therefore repayring to the Shiriffe of Shewsbury, reuealed the Duke, who diſguiſed like a poore Countriman, and digging in a groue neere vnto Baniſters Houſe, was apprehended, and with a great Guard of men was brought vnto Salisbury, where King Richard then lay, and where without arraignement or judgement, vpon the ſecond of Nouember he loſt his head: whoſe death was the leſſe lamented, for that himſelfe had beene the chiefe Inſtrument to ſet the Crowne wrongfully vpon Richards head: and yet the treachery of Baniſter was moſt ſeuerely puniſhed, as many haue obſerued, not onely in the loſſe of his reward promiſed, which he neuer had, and infamy receiued, neuer after ſhaken off; but alſo in himſelfe and children, as are thus reported; his eldeſt ſonne and heire fell mad, and dyed ſo diſtracted in a Boares Stye: his ſecond ſonne became deformed in his limmes, and fell lame; his third ſonne was drowned in a ſmall puddle of water; his eldeſt daughter was ſodainely ſtrucke with a foule leproſie, and himſelfe being of extreame age, was arraigned and found guilty of murder, and by his Clergy ſaued his life.

Baniſter betrayed his Lord the Duke of Buckingham.

A Commotion in Kent.

(36) An other Commotion at the ſame time was in Kent, where George Browne and Iohn Gilford Knights, Fogge, Scot, Clifford, and Bonting, with fiue thouſand men attempted great matters at Gravesend, but hearing of the Duke of Buckinghams ſurpriſe, diſperſed themſelues for that time. But when King Richard perceiued how he was euery where beſet, he ſent one Thomas Hutton vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with proffers of gold to circumuent and impriſon Earle Henry, who as he feared was too well friended in thoſe forraine parts, which thing indeed this Hutton well perceiued, and ſo to the King reported, that the Duke was nothing forward to bite at this baite, whereupon, thoſe that lately fled England, were indited of treaſon, and other of Henries factions beheaded, whereof Sir George Browne, and Sir Roger Clifford Knights, with foure others were beheaded at London, and at Exceter for the like cauſe dyed Sir Thomas Sentleger, who had married Lady Anne Dutcheſſe of Exceſter, King Richards own ſiſter, with others; ſo jealous was the King of his vſurped Crowne; and that nothing ſhould be laide to vnprouident fore-ſight, the coaſts he ſtored with Armies of men, furniſhed the Ports with ſtore of Prouiſion, and made all things ready to withſtand Earle Henries arriuall. Who now hauing gotten ayde of fiue thouſand Britaines, with forty veſſels wel furniſhed, ſet ſaile from thence the twelfth of October, but was taken with ſo terrible a tempeſt, that his Fleet was diſparkled, ſome into Normandy, and ſome compelled to returne into Britaine, onely the Earles Ship with one other kept the Seas, being ſore toſſed all night; and in the morning arriued in the mouth of Poole in the County of Dorſet, where he might behold the Shore full of men ſhining in armour, to his great amazement, whereupon he ſent out his Ship-boat to know whether they were friends or enemies; their anſwere was, that they were thither appointed by the Duke of Buckingham, to attend the comming of the Earle of Richmond, to conduct him in ſafety to the Duke, who lay encamped not far off, that ſo joyning their forces, they might proſecute Richard the Vſurper, who being in a manner deſtitute of men, was ſore diſtracted, and deſperate in his owne deſignes. Theſe ſmooth vntruthes notwithſtanding Earle Henry auoyded, and with a forward gale returned to Normandy, whence he ſent Meſſengers vnto young Charles King of France, whoſe father King Lewis was lately departed this life, to haue his ſafe conduct to returne into Britaine, which eaſily was granted with fauourable complements returned to the Earle. Lord Henry thus croſſed by Sea, had preſent news of Buckinghams ſurpriſe and death, with the flight of the Nobles eſcaped from Richard: who meeting with Richmond in Britaine, fell forthwith into Counſell: where firſt it was determined that Earle Henry ſhould take his oath to eſpouſe the Lady Elizabeth eldeſt daughter vnto King Edward, and the immediate heire to the Crowne, which he ſolemnely did in the Church at Rhedon: and they for their parts ſware vnto him fealty, doing him homage with no leſſe reſpect then vnto their ſole and crowned King.

(37) Of theſe proceedings King Richard ſoone heard, which indeed greatly appaled his thoughts, and all penſiue and ſad he returned out of the Weſt towards London, where to cut off the hopes of Richmonds further claime, he cauſed a Parliament to be aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and therein attainted the ſaid Earle Henry himſelfe, and all ſuch as had fled the Land in his behalfe, enacting them enemies to their naturall Country, their goods to be confiſcated, and all their Lands and Poſſeſſions to be ſeized vpon to the Kings vſe, which was ſo forwarded by his lewd Counſellors, and ſo executed by his fawning followers, that ſome better affected, ſet forth the preſent and oppreſſed eſtate in theſe ſcoffing rimes, to their further diſgrace, diuulging their names in manner as followeth;

(38) King Richards ſtate ſtanding in dangers abroad, and not altogether free from conſpiracies at home, he thought it beſt policy to enter amitie with Scotland, which he did for the terme of three yeares, and the more firme to aſſure himſelfe of that King, he intreated a marriage betwixt the Duke of Rothſay the Kings eldeſt ſonne, and the Lady de la Pole, daughter to Iohn Duke of Suffolke, and to the Dutcheſſe Elizabeth King Richards owne ſiſter, whom he ſo much fauoured, as that after the death of his owne ſonne, he proclaimed Iohn Earle of Lincolne, her ſonne and his Nephew, heire apparant to the Crowne of England, diſinheriting King Edwards daughters, whoſe Brothers he had before murdered.

(39) His feares nothing leſſened, but rather daily increaſed, he attempted once more to ſtop the Currant which led to the ſpring, to which end he ſent his Ambaſſadours loaden with Gold, and many gay promiſes vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, offering to giue him all Richmonds lands, and yearely reuenues if he would either ſend the ſaid Earle into England, or commit him there vnto priſon. the Dukes Court, could haue no communication with him, he lying extreamely ſick, and his wits too weak to entertaine diſcourſe. Whereupon Peter Landoſe his Treaſurer, a man pregnant in wit, and of great authority, tooke the motion in hand, vnto whom the Engliſh Ambaſſadors promiſed all the Earles Reuenewes if he could bring King Richards requeſt to paſſe. He greedy of gaine, and being in place to doe what he would, promiſed to effect it, conditionally that King Richard would make good his offer. Thus whileſt meſſengers poſted betwixt Peter and Richard, Iohn Biſhop of Elie being then in Flaunders, was certified by Chriſtopher Vrſwicke of all the circumſtances of this purpoſe, whereupon the Biſhop with all poſſible haſte, ſent the ſame intelligence the ſame day, and by the ſame man, vnto Earle Henry in Britaine, willing him to ſhift himſelfe and followers, into France: who forthwith ſent Vrſwicke vnto King Charles, to haue his licenſe that he might with his good liking come into his dominions, which being obtayned he cauſed the other Lords, vnder pretence to viſite the ſick Duke, to eſcape into Anjou, and two daies after changing his Apparrell with his ſeruant, waited vpon him as vpon his Maſter, and poſted thence into France: whoſe eſcape when the Treaſurer heard of, he ſent after to apprehend him, and that in ſuch haſte as at his entrance into the French dominions they were hard at his heeles.

Earle Henry hardly eſcaped.

(40) This ſuddaine flight of the Earle and of the other Engliſh Lords, the Duke of Britaine (being ſomwhat recouered of his dangerous ſicknes) tooke very greeuouſly, imputing it a great diſhonour vnto himſelfe, to ſuffer the leaſt ſuſpect of breach betwixt him and the Earle, and therefore ſore offended at Landoſe whom he ſuſpected to be deepe in the deed, he ſent for Edward Wooduile and Edward Pownings, two Engliſh Eſquires, vnto whom he deliuered a ſumme of money which he had promiſed to Earle Henry, with a conuoy vnto all the reſt of the Engliſh, to depart Vannes, bearing all their charges till they came to their Earle in France. Neither was King Charles backward to forward Earle Richmond againſt the Tyrant and Vſurper of the Engliſh Crowne. And the more to joy Henry, Iohn Earle of Oxford, impriſoned by King Edward the fourth in the Caſtle of Hammes; with Captaine Blunt his keeper, and Sir Iohn Forteſcue Porter of Callis, came vnto Earle Henry to take their fortunes in following of his. This Earle of Oxford, as we haue ſeene, was a continuall ayder of King Henry the ſixt, againſt his oppoſite King Edward, and had done many ſeruices in the Lancaſtrians cauſe, till deſtiny had caſt downe the hopes of their ſide. Him therefore Earle Henry made his chiefe Counſellor for warre, as for experience, policy, valour, and faith in that buſineſſe, no man was more meete. Whoſe proweſſe further appeared when Earle Henry wan the wreath at Boſworth-field, where, in the Front of that Battell, he lead the band of Archers, and euer after liued in great fauour with this King Henry the ſeauenth, and in great honour dyed the fourth yeare of King Henry the eight. In the like truſt for Counſell and fauour with theſe Kings, was Richard Fox Doctor of Diuinitie, who being then a ſtudent in Paris, was found by Earle Richmond to be the chiefeſt man for imployment in his French buſineſſe, which he ſo prudently and faithfully effected, as the Earle being King, acknowledging him one of his principall aduancers, made him of his Priuie-Councell, Lord Priuie-Seale, and rayſed him to very great places in Church and Common-wealth, and laſtly to teſtifie in what deare eſteeme he held him, made him God-father to his ſonne Prince Henrie, who was after King of England, with whom in great reuerence he liued a long time, euen till his eye-ſight fayled through age, and did many workes of piety, whereof Corpus Chriſti Colledge in Oxford, is and ſhall be for euer a noble witneſſe; and his honorable care of reuerend antiquity, in preſeruing the bones of many Saxon Kings, and by him beſtowed in faire Monuments in the Cathedrall Church of Wincheſter, ſhall neuer want due celebration amongſt all that honour antiquity and glorious ſtudies. But from theſe worthy Subjects, we returne againe to their Soueraigne King Henry.

(41) Whoſe beginnings thus forwarded by the Duke of Britaine and the French King, drew many Engliſh into France, and filled the heart of the Vſurper with an extreame feare; therefore to accompliſh by pollicy, what was doubtfull by Armes, he ſought to baite his hooke yet another way. The title he knew ſtood with the daughters of King Edward (his ſonnes being murdered) and among them to Ladie Elizabeth the eldeſt, whoſe marriage he wel ſaw muſt bring Henry the Crowne. But that once diuerted, his ſtreame of it ſelfe could beare no great float, nor bring any inundation into the Land, and therefore Queene Elizabeth in Sanctuary muſt be Courted, that her daughters might come to Court, and there be regarded according to their degrees. This ſo cunningly was carryed, by men that could carry themſelues to fit womens affections, that the King was purg'd of the murther of her ſonnes; ſhe made to beleeue that her ſelfe was reſpected a Dowager Queene, and ſiſter in law to the preſent King; and that himſelfe had a Prince and many Princely Peeres moſt fit matches for thoſe Princes her Daughters; that her ſonne Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet, whileſt he followed the runaway Henry, left his honorable preferments intended to him-ward; and laſtly, requiring a reconciliation with the Queene, forgaue all injuries vttered againſt him out of her womaniſh paſſions, with a moſt willing heart: and indeede theſe meſſengers were ſuch Crafts-maſters, as they brought Queene Elizabeth into a fooles-Paradiſe, and made her beleeue that their words were his heart. Whereupon forgetting all things paſſed before, as the murther of her ſonnes, the diſhonour of her husband, the baſtardy of their Children, and her owne ſcandall for Sorcery: nor remembring the faithfull promiſe ſhe made to Lady Margaret Earle Henries mother, ſhe deliuered her fiue Daughters, as Lambes committed to the rauening Wolfe, in which act of hers is ſeene the weakeneſſe of that Sexe, and the ambition whereunto by nature they are inclined; for preſently vpon the deliuery of her Daughters, ſhe ſent priuily for the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet her ſonne, then reſiding in Paris, willing him to deſiſt from the Earles Faction, and come vnto King Richard, who promiſed him preferment, and that her ſelfe and Daughters were in high fauour, all injuries on both parts forgiuen and forgotten.

Firſt therefore he began to lament the barrenneſſe of his wiues wombe, and the great dangers that the Realme was like to ſuſtaine, if himſelfe ſhould dye Iſſueleſſe, complayning often thereof vnto his Nobility, but moſt eſpecially vnto * Archbiſhop Rotheram lately releaſed out of priſon, whereby the Prelate conjectured Queene Anne had not long to liue. Then refrained he her bed, vnder pretext of Penancy, taking her defect as a ſcourge for his owne ſinnes, which day and night he fought to expiate by prayers: His next pollicy was, how her death might be wrought with the leaſt ſuſpect of wrong, and how taken when ſhe was gone: Therefore as an assay to the Peoples taste, he caused it to be giuen forth that Queene Anne was dead, which was so commonly divulged, that the rumour thereof came to her owne eare, and she hauing had sufficient experience of her Husbands proceedings, feared this to be one of his plots, mistrusting (and not without cause) that her life was in danger, whereupon all dismaid, with a lamentable countenance, she came to the King, and with weeping teares demanded, what offence shee had done, that the sentence of death was giuen against her already? Richard made it strange to see her so perplext, and with louing words, and smiling semblance, bad her liue to scandalize report, and to thinke that many yeares were yet added to her life, but whether in conceit for sorrow, or of poyson, I cannot say, she died shortly after, and was solemnely buried in the Abbey of Westminster.

Her death and buriall-place.

(43) The King thus deliuered from the bands of matrimony, and now a widdower, at liberty to choose where he would, cast glances of loue towards the Lady Elizabeth his owne brothers daughter, and began to court her for his second Queene, but the thing was so offensiue to the law of nature, and so directly against the Law of God, as all men abhorred the motion, and most of all the Maiden her selfe, which Richard perceiuing, he forbare ouer earnest pursuite, to gaine his time and to fit occasions; but most especially, hauing no leasure to wooe, his Subjects on all sides daily reuolting, and his Nobles more and more had in suspect; among whom one was Lord Thomas Stanley Earle of Darby, who had married Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, Earle Henries owne Mother: him therefore he most mistrusted, and before he would admit his departure from Court, commanded him to leaue his sonne and heire George Stanley, the Lord Strange, for his hostage, which he did, though it little auailed to binde Darbies affection vnto his side.

King Richard courteth Lady Elizabeth.

Louit. 18. 14.

Thomas Earle of Darby much suspected of the King.

George, Lord Strange, deliuered in pledge to King Richard.

(44) In this while King Richard hearing that Oxford had escaped out of the Castle of Hammes, and that he, with the Captaine thereof Iames Blunt, were fled into France, and joyned with Richmond; thought it high time to quench the sparkes in those parts, before they should rise to a higher flame; and therefore he appoynted (which was presently accomplished) the Garrison at Callis to strait the said Castle with a hard siege, being well assured that many wel-willers to the Earles proceedings lay there harboured, who vpon the least aduantage would be ready to play. But Henry not vnmindfull of his distressed friends, nor Oxford forgetting his kinde Hostesse Captaine Blunts wife, made vnto the Peece, and on the sudden put Thomas Brandon, with thirty approued Souldiers into the Castle, who from the walls played vpon the besiegers, whiles Oxford annoyed them vpon their backes, so that presently they offered, and came to a composition, which was, that they within should safely depart, but the Castle to remaine in subjection to the King.

Hammes besieged by the Garrison of Callis.

(45) Hammes thus restored, in danger to be lost, and nothing had thence besides a woman and a few suspected persons, King Richard thought himselfe now sure of all, and fearing no inuasion at home, imagined that much harme could not be done abroad: for Henry in France (as he thought) found very few friends, and was fully perswaded that the French Kings assistance stood more of words then in deedes. And indeed some occasion of such suspition was ministred; for King Charles but young, and the Princes at variance, Earle Henry was enforced to make suite vnto them man by man. Besides, Thomas Marqueſſe Dorset, sent-for by his Mother the Queene, suddenly in the night made an escape from Paris, with purpose for England, which stroke great feare among Earle Henries part, chiefly for that all their Counsels were knowne vnto the Marqueſſe, which if he should reueale, their designes were made desperate. To preuent which, he was posted after, and brought backe againe, though much against his will. These things considered, King Richard, to lessen his great charges, discharged his Nauy at seas, commanding the Welsh to watch the shoare, Beacons to be built, and armour to be ready at euery call; then giuing his affections leaue to entertaine more security, saw not the sword that hung ouer his head.

King Richards conceit.

Henry soliciteth the French, man by man.

Marqueſſe Dorset seeketh to escape from Henry.

(46) But Earle Henry deliuered from the feare of the Marqueſſe, thought it not best to prolong time, lest others vpon like purposes should bewray his intents; and thereupon obtayning a small ayde of the French, with a certaine summe of money, for which the Lord Marqueſſe (whom he much mistrusted) and Sir Iohn Bourchier were left in pledge, he set forward to Roan, and prepared his shipping in the mouth of Seyn: whither tidings was brought him of Queene Annes death, and that King Richard purposed to marry Lady Elizabeth: a feare indeed farre exceeding the former, shee being the Princesse by whom he must claime, whereupon much distemperature arose, euery mans braine working vpon the newes. But after much consultation, it was held the best to make ouer into England, to interpose the proceedings ere the match was fully made, whereupon Earle Richmond with two thousand men onely, and a small number of ships, set sayle from Harfleut the fifteenth of August, and the seauenth day following arriued at Milford-Hauen in Wales, where taking Land he came vnto Dale, and thence the next day marched to Hereford west, ten miles into the Maine, from thence he marched to Cardigan, where he had newes that the Countrey was fore-laid against him, but finding that vntrue, he made still forward, beating downe such Houlds as held against him: then sending secretly to Lady Margaret his Mother, to the Lord Stanley, Talbot, and others, signified vnto them, he meant to passe Seuerne at Shrewesbury, and thence to march directly towards London. In his way to Shrewesbury, there met him Sir Rice ap Thomas, a man of great command in Wales, with a number of men to side in his quarrell, which Henry afterwards requited in making this his first aider the Gouernour of Wales.

Earle Henry setteth forward his journey.

Henry of Richmond arriueth at Milford-Hauen.

Henry sent word of arriuage to his Mother, and others.

Sir Rice ap Thomas joyneth with Henry.

(47) The Earle more boldly from Shrewesbury, held on his march to the Towne of Newport, whither Sir Gilbert Talbot, with two thousand strong, from the young Earle of Shrewesbury, gaue him his ayde. Then passed he forward to Stafford, and had conference there with Sir William Stanley; and proceeding forward, was honourably receyued into the Citie Lichfield, where Thomas Earle of Darby, with fiue thousand armed men, had beene some few dayes before, but hearing of Earle Henries approach, remoued to Anderson, to auoid suspition of the jealous King that kept his sonne Hostage for his further truth.

Sir Gilbert Talbot joyneth with Earle Henry.

Henry commeth to Lichfield.

(48) King Richard at this time held his Court at Nottingham, where being informed that Earle Henry with a small Company was landed in Wales, made small account of what he could doe, altogether relying vpon the Lord Walter Herbert, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, two principall men, in whom he conceyued no little trust: yet lest this new-risen spring might gather-in more heads, he sent to Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Earle of Surrey, willing them with a selected power to represse the insolency of this head-strong Earle: Moreouer, he sent for Sir Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford, Knights, all of them in great jealousie and mistrust; commanding them with their forces to come and attend vpon his person, which accordingly they set forward to doe, meane while sending his Spials to know the way Henry went, had intelligence that hee was past Shrewesbury without any impeachment; whereat storming in choller, and cursing their vntruthes whom he had put in trust, craued vengeance from Heauen, and instantly instantly intended to reuenge it himselfe; then hauing notice the Earle was at Lichfield, and his party increased by daily repaire, incontinently hee marshalled his followers; and like a valiant Captaine and politicke leader set forward his Battailes fiue and fiue in a ranke. In the middest of his troopes he bestowed the Carriages belonging to his Army: and himselfe mounted vpon a white Courser, inuironed with his Guard, followed by his footmen, and the wings of Horsemen ranged on euery side, with a frowning sterne countenance, but yet in great Pompe, entred the towne of Leicester after the Sun was set, being full of indignation and swelling in anger, which somewhat he asswaged with threats of reuenge.

(49) Earle Richmond from Lichfield departed for Tamworth, and in the way met Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford going towards the King, who vpon this vnlooked-for occasion, and knowing themselues in what suspition they stood, secretly left the company of their Captaine Brakenbury the night following, & wandring in waies vnknowne, with much adoe got safely vnto the Earles Companies.

Sir Thomas and Sir Walter Hungerford, turne to Earle Henry.

(50) In the like danger through darkenesse of night, Henry himselfe chanced to come; for albeit he was a man both valiant and forward, and by his own wisedome could manage his waightiest affaires; Yet now hauing notice that King Richard with a strong army was neere, and that his Father in law, the Lord Stanley stood as a Neuter, he was strucke deepe in his dumps, and with twenty light Horse-men lingering behinde, so seriously musing what was to be done, as lastly, he lost the sight of his Hoast, and by the darkenesse of night missed his way; neither durst hee for the Kings Scout-watch demand direction to Tamworth, but lay in a small Village about three miles distant, to his no little griefe, and his whole Armies great amazement, the one prognosticating it to be a presage of an ill beginning, and the other doubting some detriment of their Lord, but in the dawning of the next morning (conducted by good fortune) hee came to his Hoast, excusing that his absence was to haue conference with his secret friends; and then priuily departing to the Lord Stanley, had conference with him, and was put in good comfort.

Henry Earle of Richmond loseth his way.

King Richard terrified with dreadfull dreames.

(51) But contrariwise, King Richard was wrapped and perplexed with feare, not onely with the departure of Sir Iohn Sauage, Sir Brian Sanford, and Sir Simond Digby, in whom he had reposed great trust, but also in the dreadfull dreames which nightly he suffered, wherein to his seeming, terrible Diuels so pulled and haled him, as by no meanes he could take any rest, which fearefull imaginations strucke so deepe an impression vnto his heart, that the signes thereof appeared in his countenance, howsoeuer he sought to put them off in shew.

(52) But being determined to put himselfe to the triall of battell, or else, (and that rather) enforced by diuine Iustice to pull the reuenging hand of heauen against him, in the morning he marched toward the enemy, and vpon a faire plaine called Redmore, neere vnto Bosworth, about seauen miles west from Leicester, he pitched downe his Tents, and thence sent a Pursuant to the Lord Stanly, commanding him to aduance forward with his company, and to come to his presence, which if hee refused to doe, hee sware by Christs passion, his sonnes head should off before that hee dyned. The Lord Stanley answered the Pursuant, that if the King did so; hee had more sonnes aliue; but to come to the King hee was not at that time determined. This answere declared, King Richard commanded the Lord Strange incontinent to be beheaded, at the very season, when the two Armies came in sight each of others, but his Counsellors tolde him, that the time was now to fight, and not to execute, which might better bee done when the field was fought: whereupon the Lord Strange was deliuered prisoner to the keepers of the Kings Tents, and the Kings holy vow thus broke, the Lord Strange escaped with life, by this bad tyrants too good a death.

Lord Stanleys answere vnto the Kings message.

The Lord Strange commanded to be beheaded.

(53) But now the time and houre of Battell being come, hee drew out his Army vpon the plaine, whose order for fight he thus placed: The foreward he ordered of a maruellous length, to strike the more terror in the beholders hearts, in whose forefront he placed his Archers, as a Bulwarke to defend the rest, the leading whereof was committed to Iohn Duke of Norfolke, with whom was Thomas Earle of Surrey, his sonne, his owne Battallion was furnished with his best approued men of warre, hauing Horsemen for wings on both sides of his battell: and being thus ordered for their further incouragement King Richard mounted in place to be heard, thus said to his Souldiers.

The order of K. Richards battell.

King Richards Oration vnto his Souldiers.

"(54) My faithfull followers, friends, and se"lected Chiefetaines, I confesse, by your puissant
"valours I first aspired to the top of this royal estate,
"in obtaining & wearing this Diademe of Imperiall "Maiesty, and maugre the seditious attempts of all
"cankered aduersaries, by your prudent and politike
"counsels I haue so gouerned the Realme, People and "Subiects, as I haue omitted nothing, I hope, apper"taining to the office of a iust Prince, nor you preter"mitted any thing belonging to the parts and duties
"of most prudent Counsellors. And albeit, that in
"the getting of the Garland I was prouoked by sini"ster Counsell, and seduced by a diabolicall temptati"on to commit a most wicked and detestable act, yet
"with salt teares and strait pennance I haue, I trust,
"expiated that hainous offence: which abhominable
"crime, I desire you as clearely to forget, as I daily
"remember to deplore and lament. If you will now
"vouchsafe to call to minde in what case we all stand,
"and in what doubtfull perill wee are intrapped, I "doubt not but that you will with mee confesse,
"that if euer amity preuailed betwixt the raised,
"and the raisers, betwixt the Prince and his Sub"iects, this day requires as much in vs both. For,
"if wise-men say true, that there is not so much "power in getting, as there is pollicy in keeping;
"the one, meere fortunes chance, the other, wise-
"domes deepe insight, then I with you, and you
"with mee, this day must needes take labour and "paines, to keepe that preheminence and possessi"on by force, which by your prudent labour I
"haue obtained. The diuell, you know, a conti-
"nuall enemy to humane society, a disturber of Con"cord, and a sower of sedition, hath entred into "the heart of an vnknowne Welshman, (whose "Father I neuer knew, nor him euer personally saw)
"exciting him to aspire and couet our Realme and "Crowne, to the disheriting of vs and of our po"sterity: You see further how a company of Trai"tors, Theeues, Out-lawes, and runnagates of "our owne Nation, besides a number of beggerly
"Britaines, and faint-hearted Frenchmen, are ayders
"and partakers of this his wicked enterprize, ready "at hand to oppresse and spoyle vs, our lands, our
"Wiues, and Children; which eminent mischiefes,
"if we then will withstand, and resist, wee must liue
"and dye together as brethren, fight together as Ly"ons, and feare not to dye together like men; thus "resolued, beleeue mee, the fearefull Hart neuer fled
"faster before the greedy Grayhound, the silly Larke
"before the Spar-hawke, or the simple Sheepe before
"the Wolfe, then these proud bragging enemies
"will run out of the Field at the sight of your manly
"visages. For haue we not already manifest tokens
"of victory and triumphs? Is not the Captaine of "the Rebellion, Richmond, a Welsh milke-sop, of no
"courage and lesse experience in Marshall feates of "war, brought vp by my brothers meanes, and mine,
"like a Bird in a Cage, in the Court of the Duke
"of Britaine, neuer saw Army, neuer wore Armour, "without practise, and therefore without knowledge
"how

King Richard confesseth his fault.

"how to gouerne a field? What are his followers, but "a sort of fainting runnagates, whose fearefull eyes, "as they could not behold our rayes in peace, can "worse abide to see our royall banner displaied against "them in fight? for their owne consciences shall be- "wray their guilt; their oathes, their periury; their "promise, infidelity; and the sight of vs their annoin- "ted Soueraigne shall either cause them shamefully to "flie, or submissiuely to yeeld themselues to our mer- "cy. As touching his French and Britaine aiders, "their valours haue beene well knowne to our Noble "Progenitors, often vanquished, but neuer vanqui- "shers, onely braggers without any great deedes, "drunkards without discretion, Ribaulds without "reason, Cowards without resistance, and (in a "word) effeminate, lasciuious, and neuer seene in "the Front of a Battell, seeking ten times more "meanes to flie and escape, then once to assault the "face of their enemies. Therefore like valiant Cap- "taines aduance forth your Standards, and make "knowne your manhoode by dint of Sword, and be "yee sure, that if euery one of you giue but one sure "stroke, the day will be ours; for how can a hand full "withstand a whole Realme? Aduance therefore "forward, my Captaines; in whom I well know is "wanting neither courage, pollicy, wisedome, nor "puissance. I therefore desire you, for your loue "to me-ward, the zeale of your natiue Countrey, "and the safety of your Prince and selues, to shew "this day your true Englisth valour, and for my selfe, "I assure you, I will this day either triumph in a glo- "rious victory, or die in this quarrell with immor- "tall Fame; in whose Palace all our names shall bee "enrolled, if we preferre the renowne of our Coun- "trey before our owne liues. Now S. George for vs, "and vs for victory; hast therefore forward, and re- "member this, that I am he who with high aduance- "ment will preferre the valiant and hardy, and with "seuere torture will punish the dastard and cowardly "Runaway. The Oration ended, as it gaue courage to some, so gaue it distast vnto others, whose hearts carried gall, though their mouthes dropped honey; some intended to turne to Earle Henry; some determined to take part with the strongest; & some meant to stand still and doe nothing; so vnsure was he of his Subiects loyalty, that had beene so traiterous to his owne Nephewes.

The diuers opinions of King Richards boast.

(55) Earle Richmond then seeing King Richard thus embattelled, sent to the Lord Stanley, who stood houering aloofe off, to come helpe him to order his fight, whose answere was, that Henry should doe it himselfe, and that he would come to him when he saw time conuenient, which strucke the Earle into a great dumpe; but now hauing no time for delay, ne- cessity compelled him to order his men. The Fore- ward he made single, according to his small number of souldiers, and in the Front placed his Archers, o- uer whom Iohn Earle of Oxford was Captaine, the right wing was led by Sir Gilbert Talbot; and the left assigned to Sir Iohn Sauage: Earle Henry himselfe with his Vncle Iasper Earle of Pembrooke gouerned the Main-Battell, better repleniſhed with horse then foote, whose whole number consisted hardly of fiue thousand, the Kings doubling the number, and more. The Battels thus ordered, Earle Henry armed at all peeces sauing his Helmet, rode from ranke to ranke, and from wing to wing, incouraging his men, and the more to encrease their hot spirits, mounted vpon a little banke, the better to be seene and heard, these words he vttered in all their hearing.

" (56) If euer God gaue victory to a iust quar- "rell, if euer he aided warre for the tuition of a King- "dome or Countrey, or euer succoured them that "fought for the relieſe of poore innocents, oppres- "sed by tyranny, then no doubt my friends and fel- "low Souldiers, but that this day he will giue vs a "triumphant victory. For if we consider for what, "and against whom we fight, we may not doubt but "that God himselfe will fight for vs. The thing "which we are here ready to try by sword, is the li- "berty of the Land from vnder the vsurpation and "yoake of a Tyrant, and hee, against whom we "draw sword, is the Monster (for I may not call him "man) which feareth neither God, Lawes, Iustice, "nor Humanity, an homicide, a murderer of his "owne kindred, a destroyer of the Nobilitie, a Mawle "to his Subiects, and a firebrand to the whole King- "dome, whom iust vengeance craueth to haue quen- "ched: and consider I pray you, who be of his band, "euen such as by murder and vntruth to their kinne "and Countrey, haue got wrongfull possession of "our rightfull inheritance, letting your wiues weepe, "and Orphanes wander, to seeke their liuelyhoode "where they can get it, whose teares I doubt not "cry in the eares of the Lord, who will punish these "Malefactors either with pricke of conscience cow- "ardly to flye, or deliuer themselues into our hands "without Battell: Consider further, I pray you, "that in yonder great Battell are men brought more "for feare then for loue, by force compelled and not "willingly assembled; persons that desire more the "destruction, then the life of their Captaine, and fi- "nally a multitude, whereof the most part bee our "friends, and the least part his that leades them; and "surely it stands in suspence, whether the malice of "the Souldiers towards their Generall, or his feare "conceiued against them, be the greater; for this is a "rule infallible, that as ill-men daily couet to destroy "the good, so God appointeth the good men to con- "found the ill, and if it be true that Clerkes preach "that the one is to be hated, and the other beloued, "who then can spare yonder tyrant Richard Duke of "Glouceſter vntruely calling himselfe King, that hath "broken both the Lawes of God and Man, in the "bloud of his brother, the murther of his Nephews, "the death of his Wife, the slander of his owne Mo- "ther, and the bastardizing of his brethren? If you "haue not heard, yet I haue read that Tarquin the "proud, for the rape of Lucretia, lost the Kingdome "of Rome: yet was not his fact so detestable as Ne- "roes, who slew his owne Mother, to behold the "place of his conception: but yonder vsurper is "both these persons in one; a Nero in murther of his "young Nephewes, and in defaming the wombe of "his owne conception: and a Tarquine, intending to "defile, and carnally to know his owne Neece, vnder "pretext of holy Matrimony, which Lady you are "witnesse I haue sworne shall be my wife. This is the "quarrell for which we are here this day assembled, "and for whose equity wee craue God to be iudge: "a good beginning of his Protection we haue alrea- "dy seene, in escaping the treasons laid for vs in Bri- "taine, the dangers of Seas, and our safe arriuage vnto "this place, not hunted by any, but rather our selues "hunting after that furious Bore; who this day, and "in this place, is so intangled in his owne toyle, as his "crooked tuskes shall not be able to gnaw the cords "of his snare asunder, nor himselfe haue power to "free himselfe from his pursuers, whose Iauelines (I "doubt not) shall be dyed in the bloud of this filthy "Swine, & shall well-rid the world of an vgly hog'd- "backed Monster: which thing to accomplish let vs "remember, that victory is not gotten by multitude, "but by manhoode, but the smaller number wee bee, "the greater is our glory if wee vanquish, if vanqui- "shed, fretting time shall neuer consume our memo- "ry, that died to free our selues, and Nation from "the oppression of an vsurping Tyrant; and thus I "assure you, that for so iust a cause you shall finde "me this day rather a dead Carrion vpon the colde "ground, then a Carpet-prisoner kept aliue for re- "proch. Aduance therefore forward like true-hearted Englishmen, display your Banner in defence of your "Countrey, get the day and be Conquerours, loose "the Battell and be villaines; God and Saint George "giue vs a happy successe. Which no sooner was said but that the Souldiers buckled their Helmes, the Archers stript vp their sleeues, bent their bowes and frushed frushed their feathers, attentiuely listening when the Trumpet should giue the sound of Battell.

(57) Betwixt both the Armies there lay a great marish, which Earle Henry left vpon his right hand; with purpose to haue that for a defence, as also the Sunne at his backe, and face of the enemy, which King Richard perceiuing, with sound of Trumpet, and shout of his Army, passed the Marish, when the Bow-men on both sides let freely fly their arrowes: the rest comming to encounter with strokes: but the Earle of Oxford fearing to be encompassed by the enemy, commanded euery of his rankes to keepe within ten foote of his Standard, which being accomplished, and their fight a while stayed, their opposites mistrusting some fraud or deceit, ceased likewise from theirs, many of them willing inough so to doe; notwithstanding, immediately a cruell battell was againe begunne, and manfully continued vpon either part. Till lastly, King Richard hauing intelligence that the Earle of Richmond was but slenderly accompanied with men of Armes, and them also busied in their owne guardes, meant by his incounter to finish the day, as the onely man vpon whom stood all the hope of his enemies successe; and therfore hauing the markes of Earle Henry, made from the range of his owne battell, and vpon the spurre with the Speare in his Rest, ranne violently towards him in a furious spleene; in which rage, at the first brunt, he bare-downe and ouerthrew the Earles Standard, and slew Sir William Brandon the bearer thereof; next, matching with Sir Iohn Cheiney a man of great might, manfully threw him to the ground, thereby making an open passage by dint of sword vnto the Earle himselfe: Richmond beholding the high valour of Richard, most Lyon-like coped with this cruell Bore, and held him (maugre his tuskes) at his sword point, betwixt whom the fight was so desperate, that Henries company were strucke in great despaire; at which very instant Sr. William Stanley came in with three thousand tall fresh Souldiers, who entred the battell with such courage and valour, as they bare downe all before them where they went, whereat the Kings side began to faint, & to giue ouer fight, but the more resolute a while maintaining their ground, and now mistrusting treason among themselues, turned their backes and ran away, whereby King Richard presently perceiued the downefall of his ill-raised glory, and the full period of his short raigne: and all hope of resistance now past, a swift horse was brought to escape the field, with comforts that another day might set the victory on his side: but with a mind vnmatchable in hatred against Henry, or rather to haue his death registred in fames honourable role, whose life had beene blotted with the pen of divulged infamy, he hastily closed his Helmet, saying, that, that day should make an end of all battels, or else in this now in trying, he would finish his life, which last was presently performed; for thrusting into the middest of his enemies, and there valiantly fighting among the thickest, he obtained more honour in this his two houres fight, then he had gained by all the actions of his whole life.

(58) There dyed that day with him Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, Sir Robert Brakenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more: Sir William Catesby one of King Richards chiefe Counsellors, with two others, were taken, and two dayes after beheaded at Leicester, among them that escaped were Francis Viscount Louell, Humfrey and Thomas Stafford Brethren, which three tooke Sanctuary at Saint Iohns in Glouceſter. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey, though he submitted himselfe vnto Henry, yet was hee committed to the Tower, and therein a long time remained. Vpon Earle Henries part onely ten men were slaine, as Sir Gilbert Talbot wrote the newes from the field, wherof for note Sir William Brandon was the best; in all to the number of foure thousand men. This battell was fought the two and twentieth of Auguſt, and yeare of Christ Iesus 1485. in the field Redmore, neere vnto Bosworth, in the County of Leiceſter; after which, Earle Henry gaue thankes vnto God, and commending his Souldiers, with sufferance for them to take the spoyles of the field, dubbed many of them Knights; which his doings was so acceptable to the whole Army, as with great applause they all cryed King Henry, King Henry; whose forwardnesse to him-ward, when the Lord Stanley perceiued, hee tooke King Richards Crowne, found among the spoyle of the field, and set it vpon the Earle of Richmonds head, thereby confirming the election of the people, at which instant began the raigne of this new King. King Henry (for from henceforth so was he called) for their valiant seruice done in this battell, knighted in the field Sr. Gilbert Talbot, Sr. Iohn Mortimer, Sir William Willoughby, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Robert Pointes, Sir Humfrey Stanley, Sir Iohn Turbarvile, Sir Hugh Perſhall, Sir R. Hegecome, Sir Iohn Bikenylle, and Sir Edmund Baron of Carewe.

(59) The slaine body of the vsurping Tyrant, all tugged, and torne, naked, and not so much as a clout left to couer his shame, was trussed behind Blanch Seint-Leger (or White-Bore, a Pursuant at Armes,) like a Hogge or Calfe, his head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and his legges on the other, and all be-sprinckled with mire and bloud, was so brought into Leiceſter, and there for a miserable spectacle the space of two dayes lay naked and vnburied, his remembrance being as odious to all, as his person deformed, and lothsome to be looked vpon: for whose further despite, the white Bore his cognizance was torne downe from euery Signe, that his monument might perish, as did the monies of Caligula, which were all melted by the decree of the Senate: Lastly, his body without all funerall solemnity was buried in the Gray-Fryers Church of that City. But King Henry his Successor, of a princely disposition, caused afterward his Tombe to be made with a picture of Ablablaster, representing his person, & to be set vp in the same Church; which at the suppression of that Monastery was pulled downe, and vtterly defaced; since when his graue ouer-growne with Nettles and weeds, is very obscure, and not to be found. Onely the stone chest wherein his corps lay, is now made a drinking trough for Horses at a common Inne, and retaineth the onely memory of this Monarchs greatnesse. But his body (as tradition hath deliuered) was borne out of the City, and contemptuously bestowed vnder the end of Bow-Bridge, which giueth passage ouer a branch of Stowre vpon the West side of the Towne. Vpon this Bridge (the like report runneth) stood a stone of some height, against which King Richard, as he passed toward Bosworth, by chance strucke his spur, and against the same stone as he was brought backe, hanging by the horse side, his head was dashed and broken, as a wise-woman (forsooth) had foretold, who, before Richards going to battell, being asked of his successe, said, that where his spurre strucke, his head should be broken; but of these things, as is the report, so let be the credite. Dead he is, and with his death ended the factions a long time continued betwixt the Families of Lancaſter and Yorke; in whose bandings, to bring, set, and keepe, the Crowne on their heads, eight or nine bloudy set battels had beene fought, and no lesse then foureſcore persons of the bloud-royall slaine, as Philip Comines the French Writer saith; many of them being well knowne to himselfe: after which stormes, and this Tyrants death, a blessed vnion ensued, by ioyning those houses in Henry of Lancaſter, and Elizabeth of Yorke.

(60) Hee was of Stature but little, and of shape deformed, the left shoulder bunching out like a Mole-hill on his backe, his haire thinne, and face short, a cruell countenance, in whose aspect might bee perceiued both malice and deceit. When hee stood musing (as he would doe oft) his vse was, to bite

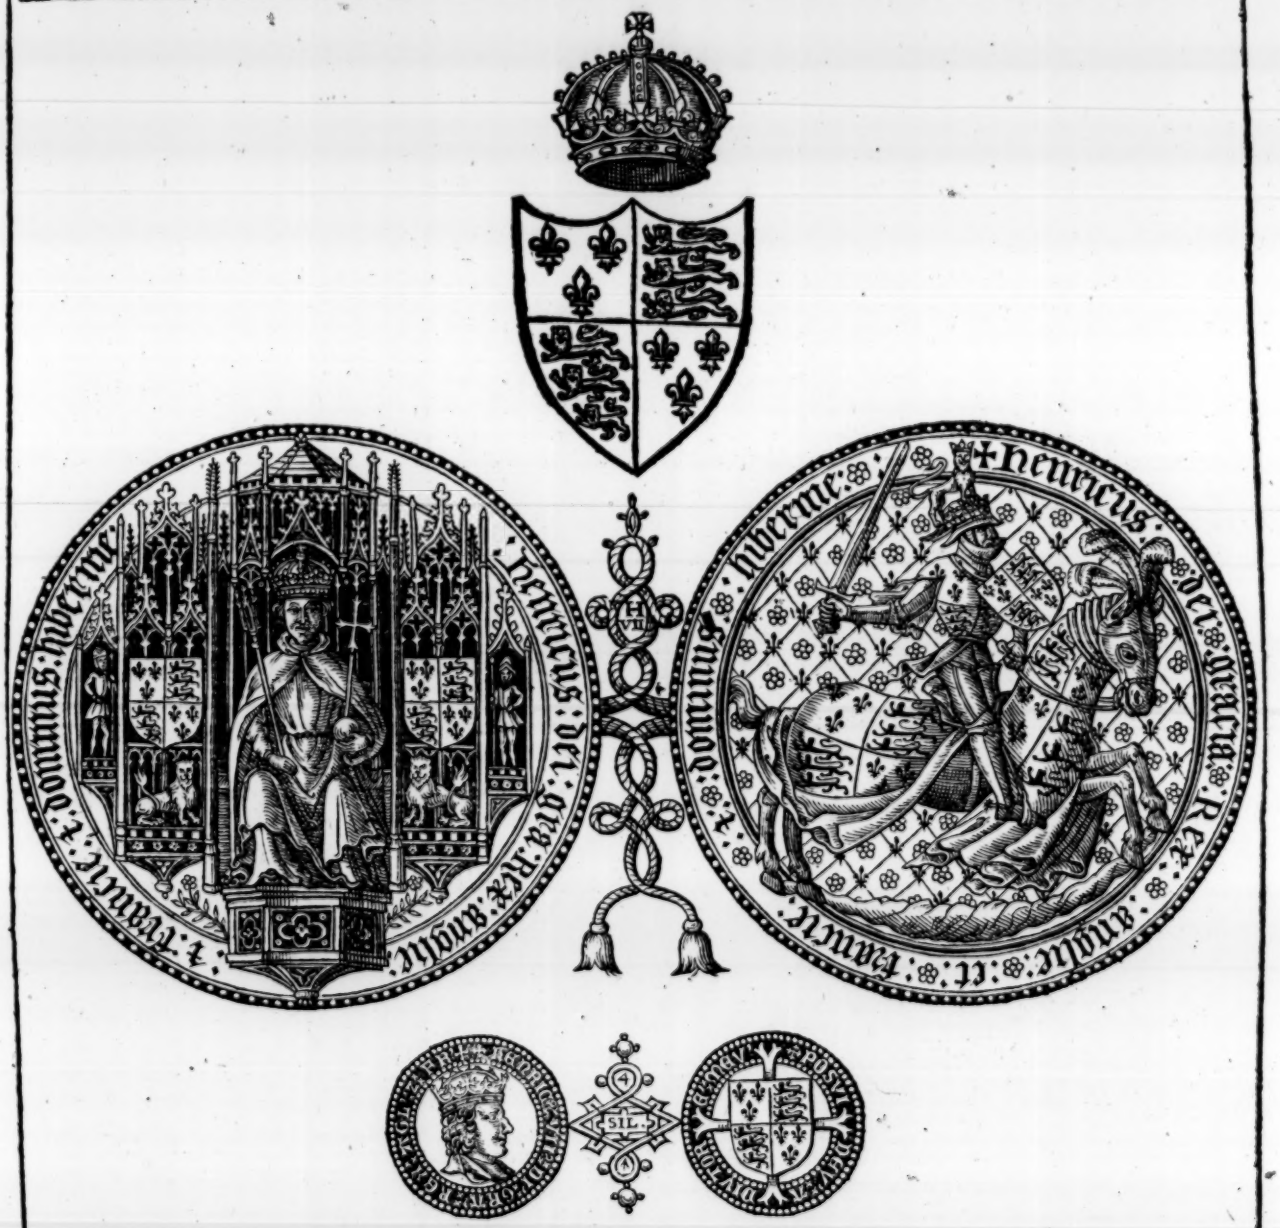
HENRIE THE SEAVENTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE SEAVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Henrie VII. Monarch 57



CHAPTER XX.

An.D.1485. 22.Auguſt. The date of his raignes commencement.

HENRIE of that name the ſeauenth, hauing by ſuch mixt meanes of valor and practiſe as are already deſcribed, obtained the poſſeſſion of Englands Crown, we muſt now preſent vnto you his actions in the perſon and ſtate of a King, maintained by him with like mixture of courage and skill as it was atchieued, to the verification of that rule; That things are kept by the ſame Arts whereby they were gained. In deſcribing whereof, wee meane nothing leſſe, then for humoring the vaine admirers of phraſe and conceit, to mount vp into Panegyricall flouriſhes, in honour of the man, though his excellent vertues would worthily beare, if not duely alſo exact them: yet may wee not omit to obſerue, that as in his attaining to the Crowne, there was (through diuine prouidence) a concurring diſpoſition of all important Circumſtances, without which his attempt might haue proued diſaſterous; ſo hee, hauing now poſſeſſed the Soueraigne power, and maſtered the State in the maine poynts, eaſily made circumſtances waite vpon his wiſdome, and to take their forme from his directions: Of the firſt kinde, wherein his felicity deſerues to be celebrated, were theſe. That he by the Male-line a meere ſtranger to both the royall houſes, as deſcended from the Welſh and French, and by the female ſpringing out of ſuch a Family of Lancaſter (the Beaufords) as by the ſame law which enabled it to inherite in ordinary eſtates, was made incapable of ſucceſſion in the Regalitie, ſhould ſo ſafely be conuayed away into forraine parts, there to continue an head of expectation and reuolt, during ring the inteſtine troubles and dangers, to him ineuitable here at home. Secondly, that the Realme of England ſhould bee ſo auerted from Richard, (though a very honourable, wiſe, iuſt and neceſſary Prince, after hee was ſomewhat ſetled) as for his ſake, to neglect (in a ſort) ſo many naturall heires of the houſe of Yorke, ſome of them in right preceding Richard; ſuch were the children of Edward the fourth, and George Duke of Clarence, Richards elder Brethren, and all of them iuſt barres to the Earle of Richmond, who ſcarce had any thing of a legall title, or of a warrantable intention; but his purpoſe to remoue an Vſurper, and marry the Lady Elizabeth, the rightfull inheritrice. Thirdly, a long and fatall * ſlackneſſe of Richard in his warlike preparations, through the meere contempt of his enemy the Earle, which was the cauſe, that both hee landed ſecurely, and Richard was driuen to fight in a manner with tumultuary, rather then trained forces. And finally, that a principall, potent, noble, and yet a deepely ſuſpected Conſpirator, (as being Father in law to the Earle) ſhould haue charge, vnder Richard, ouer a chiefe portion of his Army, at the very inſtant of ioyning battell.

* Fabian ſaith, Richard fearing little, prouided little defence.

(2) Theſe conſiderations (among many other) had in them ſuch an aptitude to his deſigne, as no humane wit could faſhion, and without the which a man of equall ſtarres and parts to Henry, or Henry himſelfe, might in vaine haue beene wiſe, in vaine induſtrious and vailiant. Circumſtances of the other ſort ſhall plentifully occurre in the whole carriage of his enſuing actions. In both which, are verified two contrary rules; for the ſtate of the firſt obſeruations teacheth vs with Plautus, that Centum doctorum hominum conſilia hæc vna vincit Dea; This one Goddeſſe can effect more, then the wits of an hundred learned men; ſpeaking, as an Heathen man, of that famous Idoll Fortune; and in the ſecond, that which Iuuenall excellently noteth;

The deſcription of King Henries minde and qualities.

* Sir Fr. Bacon, frag. M.S.

(3) Now for the Character of this famous wiſe Prince (which with reaſon ought to be ſet in front to his actions, as certaine lights of the mind, by which to diſcerne the fountaine of counſels and cauſes) a * learned, eloquent Knight, and principall Lawyer of our time, giues vs many things, of which theſe ſelected, are very regardable. "This King (ſaith he) attained vnto the Crowne, not only from a priuate fortune, which might endue him with a moderation, but alſo from the fortune of an exiled man, which had quickned in him all the ſeeds of obſeruation and induſtry. His wiſedome (ſpeaking thereof as it was in his raigne) ſeemed rather a dexterity to deliuer himſelfe from dangers, when they preſſed him, then any deepe fore-ſight to preuent them a farre off. Iealous he was ouer the Greatneſſe of his Nobility, as remembring how himſelfe was ſet vp. Great and deuout reuerence he bare vnto Religion, as he that imployed Eccleſiaſticall men in moſt of his affaires. In his gouernment hee was led by none, ſcarcely by his Lawes, and yet he was a great obſeruer of formality in all his proceedings, which notwithſtanding was no impediment to the working of his will. In his wars (meaning domeſticke) he was rather confident then enterprizing, by which alſo he was commonly not the poorer. Generally, he ſeemed inclinable to liue in peace, & in the quenching of the Commotions of his ſubiects hee was euer ready to atchieue thoſe wars in perſon, ſomtimes reſeruing himſelfe, but neuer retiring himſelfe. Of nature he coueted to accumulate treaſure: in expending whereof hee neuer ſpared charge that his affaires required, and in his foundations was magnificent enough. Hee choſe commonly to imploy cunning perſons, as he that knew himſelfe ſufficiently to make vſe of their vttermoſt reaches, without danger of being abuſed with them himſelfe.

(4) * Another hauing a purpoſe to write in Engliſh the Hiſtory of this Henry (an Argument which for the worthy doing thereof, requires as wiſe a man as Henry himſelfe) hath among many extraordinary praiſes (moſt-what framed out of his ſtrong affection) truely noted concerning his atchieuement of the "Crowne: That the Almighty hand of God brought him ouer the top of the higheſt and moſt dangerous obſtacles, to ſway this Scepter, when neither Title, Power, nor (great) Probability could giue him ſo much as one ſound puſh to ſet him forward. And of "the man himſelf; That he entertained that, as ſodain, as Soueraigne change of fortune, with ſuch moderation, and vn-tranſported diſcretion, as it well-appeared he had throughly conquered himſelfe, before hee ſubdued the Vſurper his enemy. What could be added greater to ſo true a praiſe? nothing certainly: for that he (as elſe-where that Writer ſaith) was the Salomon, who brought peace to this Kingdome, long before oppreſſed by warre and tyranny: it was onely an excellent effect of that excellent moderation. Other Authors of our times concurre in the ſame iudgement of him, whom they praiſe * for ſingular wiſedome, excellent temperance, and moderate frugality; for * policy, iuſtice, and grauity: which princely vertues cauſed him to be highly reuerenced of forraine Princes. Theſe honorable Eulogies, after ſo many yeares from his death, iuſtly countenance their relations, who * writing, in or about his owne dayes auerre no leſſe; among whom, Bernard Andreas of Tholouz is moſt flowing and abundant. This Andreas (as himſelfe writes) was afterward entruſted with the inſtruction of Prince Arthur (eldeſt ſonne to King Henry) in good letters, though he was blinde; and hauing aſwell the title of Poet Laureat, as of the Kings Hiſtoriographer, (how hardly ſoeuer thoſe two faculties meet with honour in the ſame perſon) meant to haue hiſtorified and poetized the Acts of this King, but (for want of competent and attended inſtructions in many places of chiefe importance) left his labour full of wilde breaches, and vnfiniſhed; yet in ſuch poynts as hee hath profeſſed to know, not vnworthy to be vouched: for there is in him a great deale of cleare elocution, and defæcated conceit aboue the ordinary of that age. He, among other verſes in honor of this our Henry (whom he enſtyleth the moſt ſapient King) hath theſe, not hyperbolicall, but proper, wherein he ſalutes him.

But notwithſtanding theſe great praiſes, there want not ſome who thinke him to haue been an heauy Father to the Common-wealth, which by ſundry courſes hee greatly laboured to bring vnder, as a ſeeming ground-worke of his owne, and his poſterities ſecurity. Henrie's firſt actions after his victorie.

(5) Let vs now behold his vertues as they are ſhiningly deduced into action. After the Battell, he hauing truely firſt aſcribed the whole good of his ſucceſſe to God, commanded, that to the body of * his enemy K. Richard, an honourable interrement ſhould be giuen in the Friers at Leiceſter, where notwithſtanding * he was with little reuerence buried. From thence the King made ſpeed to London, as to the chiefe ſeate and Epitome of the Engliſh Monarchy, without-which no Prince found himſelfe heere ſecure enough: hee entred the Citie vpon a * Saturday, as vpon a Saturday he obtained his triumphall and Crowning victory. The Mayor of London and his fellowſhip, * receiued him in Violet at Harnſey Parke, but his entrance (which was at * Shordich) was honoured with a very great troupe of the Peeres, and Nobles in his traine, at which our Poeticall Hiſtorian Andreas was preſent, and ſaluted the victorious Prince with certain Latine Sapphicks, which he ſung vnto him, as himſelfe writeth. But Henry ſtaied not in Ceremonious greetings and popular acclamations, which (it ſeemes) he did purpoſely eſchue, for that (Andreas ſaith) he entred * couertly, meaning belike, in an Horſe-litter or cloſe Chariot. His lodging was in the Biſhop of Londons Pallace, where (after publike offertories and ſolemne thankes giuen to God in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul) the buſineſſe of his Coronation was ſeriouſly conſulted of; which was afterward (vpon his remoue to the Tower, where he * created his Vncle Iaſper Earle of Pembroke, Duke of Bedford, and other Eſtates) with due pompe and rituall magnificence * accompliſhed at Weſtminſter.

(6) But the naturall ſolder and indiſſoluble cement, which muſt make this Kingdome ſtand, was his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of the late Edward the fourth. This, as a point of moſt importance, was with great maturity and iudgement againe thought vpon, when Henry was now already crowned. The remoter danger, ſuppoſed to reſide in the perſon of Edward Earle of Warwicke (onely ſonne and heire, euen in his infelicities, to that vnfortunate Prince George Duke of Clarence) was preuented; for he had beene, by King Henries direction, brought vp priſoner from the Manour of * Sherif-hutton in Yorkſhire, (where aſwell he, as the Lady Elizabeth were kept by King Richard vnder guard) and immediatly ſhut vp within the Tower of London.

(7) Frances * Duke of Britaine had offered Henry, before his departure, to match him with the Lady Anne his eldeſt daughter and ſole heire, but hee was otherwiſe affected, as placing his loue where it might afford him greateſt and preſenteſt ſtrengths. Andreas addeth, that King Edward himſelfe deſtinated his eldeſt daughter vnto Henry then Earle of Richmond, and ſought in his life-time to haue effected it; but his meaning being (belike) ſuſpected, as but a drift to get Henry into his hands, the motion tooke no hold, as reſerued till God had cleared the way of all ſuch impediments, as might hinder the conſolidation of both the Royall families, Yorke, & Lancaſter, (after their ſo mortall and confuſiue maſſacres) in the perſon of one Soueraigne.

Lady Elizabeth deſcribed.

(8) The Lady herſelfe, beſides youth and beauty (precious Ornaments of that Sexe) had in her from her * infancy a wonderfull feare, & care to pleaſe God, and a like duteous and humble carriage toward her Parents: her Brothers and ſiſters ſhe did exceedingly loue, and as well toward the poore, as all the Seruants of Chriſt, ſhe bare a ſingular affection. * Her Vncle (the late Vſurper) in contempt of God and man (whoſe Lawes hee was ſo long accuſtomed to violate, till the iuſt reward thereof did at the length ouertake him) inceſtuouſly meant to haue defiled her, vnder the abuſed name of Matrimony. When therefore the newes of his death came to her eare, the ioy of her heart brake forth into theſe words: * *So, yet at the laſt thou haſt, ô God, regarded the humble, and not deſpiſed their prayers. I well remember, neither ſhall I at any time be weary to remember that my moſt noble father, of famous memory, meant to haue beſtowed me in marriage vpon this moſt comely Prince. O that I were now worthy of him; but my Father being dead, I want ſuch good friends as ſhould motion ſo great a matter: and perhaps he will take a wife from forraigne parts, whoſe beauty, age, fortune, and dignity ſhall be more then mine. What ſhall I ſay? I am all alone, and dare not open my mind to * any. What if I acquainted my mother therewith? Baſhfulneſſe forbids: What if ſome of the Lords? Audacity wanteth. O then that I might but confer with him! perhaps in diſcourſe I might let ſlip ſuch a word as might diſcouer my intention. What will be I know not: this I know, that Almighty God cannot tell how to abſent himſelfe from them who truſt in him. Therefore I make an end of thinking; and repoſe my whole hope vpon thee, ô my God, doe with me according to thy mercy.* She ſecretly thus reuoluing all matters, and reſoluing of them in her minde, was heard from aboue; for King Henry hauing vnderſtood the honour, chaſtity, and ſingular vertues of the maiden Princeſſe, the rather inclined to make her the Soueraigne of his affections: aſſigning therefore * a day, wherein (for the vtter aboliſhment of all Hoſtilities betweene the two Royall Houſes of Yorke & Lancaſter) to eſtabliſh an vnion of Families, by coniunction of their two perſons in marriage.

In the Parliament was attainted Richard late Duke of Gloceſter, ſtiling himſelfe by vſurpation, King Richard the third; & with him, by name, many other of the Nobility and Gentry. And yet withall, to lay a foundation for his greene Gouernment in loue and clemency, hee, during the Parliament proclaimed free pardon and entire reſtitution of their fortunes, to all ſuch as ſubmitted themſelues to his mercy, and made oath of Fidelity. A ſeaſonable and neceſſary Act; Whereby hee greatly weakened malicious humors, and wanne to himſelfe no ſmall acceſſion of friendſhip and ſeruices; for many forſooke Sanctuaries, and tooke vp their refuges in his goodneſſe and moſt gracious fauour. And to remoue all ſcandall and danger from his friends, he reuerſed and reuoked all former Acts, hurtfull either to himſelfe, or to them for his cauſe, the whole houſe of Parliament, * concurring finally in eſtabliſhing by a ſolemne Act, the Crowne vpon him, and his heires for euer.

Almighty God to send the King & Queene most prosperous successe, and an infinite encrease of the common ioy, by bestowing vpon them a young Prince, and other Issue, at his good pleasure: Which prayers (saith Andreas) our Lord Iesus Christ vouchsafed to heare; the Queene within a while after, prouing with Childe, of whom shee was happily deliuered in the moneth of September following at Winchester, which to the most fortunate King was a new happinesse, to the Queene a great reioycement, to the Church a soueraign delight; to the Court an exceeding pleasure; and in briefe to the whole Kingdome an incredible contentment. Nor that without reason, as it afterward appeared; for (if God had been pleased to haue granted longer life) not England onely, but the whole world should in such a pledge haue had cause of eternall reioycement. But God, who gouernes all things, and in whose hand are as well the Scepters of Princes, as dates of their liues, disposed otherwise.

(12) Meane-while there were not a few who did enuie to King Henry this vnexpected height of felicitie; but they who first discouered themselues, were certaine remaines of the late ouerthrow at Bosworth, whose diffidence, or euill-will, was greater then to relie vpon King Henries clemency, or to behold the dazeling brightnesse of his new atchieued glory; and for that cause refused to forsake the Sanctuary, which they had taken at Colchester. These were, the Lord Louell, Sir Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother. Who, while the King, secure of dangers behinde him, was in his Progresse at Yorke, meaning by affability, bounty, and other his wisest courses, to gaine the good wills of the Northern people, (with whom the memory of King Richard was very deare) and so to weaken the strengths and hopes of all future conspiracies, forsooke their refuge, and secretly in seuerall places gathered forces, therewith to surprize and dethrone the King. The Lord Louell raised his forces with such speed, that the King, who at Lincolne first heard of his escape, and lightly regarded the same, was no sooner setled in Yorke, but certaine intelligence came that hee approached fast with an Army; and withall, that the Staffords had assembled forces in Worcestershire, meaning to assault the City of * Worcester. The extremity of the King (who neuer dreamt of such a darling) was not small, for neither had he any sufficient numbers about him of his sure friends, nor could iustly repose confidence in the Northern men, whose loue to King Richard their late slaine Lord, made them still suspected. But danger quickeneth noble courages, and therefore vpon due recollection of himselfe, hee armes about three thousand men, (if tanned leather, whereof the most of their breast-pieces, for want of other stuffe, were framed, may be called armour) and sends them vnder the leading of Iasper Duke of Bedford, with commission to pardon, or to fight. The Duke offering pardon, the Lord Louell fled by night to * Sir Thomas Broughton into Lancashire, where he lurked certaine moneths; the headlesse multitude yeeld without stroake, and the felicity of King Henry preuailes in euery place; for the Staffords hearing what had happened to their Confederates, disperse their Cloude of rebels, and speedily take refuge at Colnham, a Village about two miles from Abingdon in Oxfordshire. But the priuiledges of that place * being iuridically scand in the Kings Bench, they were found vnable to afford protection to open traitors, whereupon they were forceably taken thence, and conuaied to the Tower of London, from whence Sir Humfrey Stafford was drawne and executed at Tiburne, but his brother Thomas by the Kings mercy had his pardon. These short dangers and troubles, by reason of their suddainty did worthily make the King wakefull euen ouer smaller accidents; this blaze being kindled from so neglected sparkles. But there followed deuises, which in their owne nature were so strangely impudent, and in their vent so strongly bolstered, that if Louels enterprise made him suspitious, these other might iustly fill him with innumerable iealousies.

(13) The records are immortall, which testifie, that the erection of Idols and Counterfeits, to dethrone them who are in possession, is a very olde Stratagem. What troubles a Pseudo-Nero wrought, by support of the Parthians (who wonderfully fauoured Nero liuing,) the Romane Writers teach vs. Neither hath the Diuell (Father of Impostures) any so solemne practise, as Personation and Resemblances of true, whether men or things. Insomuch that some Diuines haue thought, that as he can, and often doth transshape himselfe into the forme of a Celestiall Angell, so that he also deceiued our first mother vnder that resplendent but assumed-habite. And what mischiefs he wrought, in this very kind of thrusting out into the world false pretenders, the speech of wise* Gamaliel testifieth, who rehearseth the names of Theudas and Iudas Galilæus; but the world hath since had more woefull experience hereof, in that execrable Impostor Mahomet, pretending to bee the Messiah. In England it selfe (before the time of this Henry) what strange practises and conspiracies were set on foote vnder the title of a Pseudo-Richard in the raigne of Henry the fourth, the former Histories haue sufficiently opened, so that this Prince encountred nothing new in the Generall, howsoeuer pestilent and extraordinary in the particular. Indeed his raigne (more perhaps then any other of his predecessors) afforded plentifull matter for such deuises to worke vpon, there being many then, who hauing been * conceiued (as it were) in the bowels of Sedition, and neurished with the bitter and pernicious milke of dissention, were not onely apt to embrace, but also, where they were not offered, euen there to beget occasions of confounding all. Men, * who could neither endure warre, nor peace long, nor any lawes in either, as desirous to enioy the licentious violences of ciuill warre; a * misery, which all words (how wide soeuer) want compasse to expresse The strange attempts of which kinde of men (or rather Monsters) we shall see exemplified in the subsequent tragedies. Richard Simon, an ambitious and imposterous wretch, and withall a Priest, neither vnlearned, (the sacred shadow of which name the rather countenanced his practises) in hope to make himselfe the principall Bishop of England, plotted the aduancement of Lambert Symnell (being his pupill in the Vniuersity of Oxford) to the Crowne of England; instigated thereto by the diuell, and suborned by such as fauoured the White-rose faction, vpon this occasion. There went a rumour, that Edward Earle of Warwicke, sonne and heire to George the late vnfortunate Duke of Clarence, second brother of King Edward, * was either already murthered, or should shortly be. This Architect of guile, Simon, hauing this Symnel in tuition, (the * sonne of a Baker, or Shoomaker, but a well-faced and Princely-shaped youth, of no * very euill nature, but as it was corrupted by his Tutor,) meanes, out of this rumors aery substance, to produce an apparition and prodegy, which in Title, behauiour, and artificiall answeres (infused by his Tutors practises) should resemble * one of King Edwards Children. Here we must confesse, that our Authors leade vs into a perplexity: Some * affirming, that this counterfeit was exhibited to the world vnder the name of Edward Earle of Warwicke, sonne of the Duke of Clarence, by the daughter of the most turbulent and fatall Earle of Warwicke, slaine at Barnet-field. But hereunto reason seemes repugnant. For what ground of claime could that Gentleman haue, not onely for that his Father was attainted, but much more for that the Queene of England then in being, was the indubitate eldest daughter and heire of king Edward the fourth, and sister and next heire to Edward the fifth? Neither wants there ancienter authority then any of the others, affirming, that this Idoll did vsurpe the name of one of King Edwards sonnes; many arguments concurring to buttresse this affirmation. For, if at the the ſame time (as Polydor writeth) it was bruted, that the ſonnes of King Edward the fourth had not *beene murthered vnder their vſurping Vncle Richard, but were eſcaped, and liued in obſcurity beyond the Sea; how can that be true, which Stow and the reſt (who follow Polydore therein) affirme, that Lambert was crowned King of England at Dublin in Ireland, as heire to George Duke of Clarence? For with what injurie to the royall brethren (fained to be aliue) was that? Verily there ſeemes no coherence in the circumſtances, nor apparence of truth in the ſubſtance. And how much ſtronger to the purpoſe of the Conſpirators was the fiction of an Edward, the Kings ſonne, and himſelfe once proclaimed King, then of an Edward, who was but an Earle, and a Duke of Clarences heire? But you will aske, what was the poore Earles part in this tragedie? what other, then that by rumoring his murther, they might bring the perſon of King Henry into common deteſtation for his cruelty? For clearing whereof the King publikely afterward ſhewed the Earle to the view of all. And albeit the vulgar fame is, that Lambert was called Edward, yet * one who then liued, ſaith directly, that this Cypher was dubbed and mounted from his owne meane ranke to the title of a King, vnder the name of the ſecond Brother, who for certaine was called Richard: but what Record there is to the contrary, is to vs as yet vnknowne; for our vulgar Bookes extant can hardly paſſe with a Iury of ordinary Criticks, and Cenſors for vnchallengeable euidence.

(14) This aery Typhon (which graſped at the embracement of the two Kingdomes of England and Ireland) thus throughly ſchooled and inſtructed, is ſecretly conuaied by his Sinonian Tutor to Dublin, the chiefe City of the Iriſh, where he was confident of partakers, as amongſt the hereditary Clients, and adherents of the houſe of Yorke; which affection was firſt breathed into them by the cunning popularities of the Lord Richard Duke of Yorke, the firſt of that line, who publiquely claimed the Engliſh Crowne. His hopes deceiued him not, for the Lord * Chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Fitz-Gerald (of the noble Familie of the Geraldines) preſently profeſſed himſelfe for the plot, and by his authority and perſwaſions drew the generality of the Iriſh after him into it. Meſſengers are hereupon diſpatched, vpon all hands both into England, to ſuch as they had hope of, and into low Germany to the Ladie Margaret, ſiſter of King Edward the fourth, Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundy, a moſt mortall enemy of the Lancaſtrian Family. In both places the lighted matches of ſedition found powdry ſpirits, and wonderfull correſpondence. There is flocking from all parts to ſupport the quarrell, and the Iriſh (to haue the glory of giuing England a King) proclaime and reuerence this painted puffe, and flying bubble, with royall Style and honours.

(15) Henrie ſeeing the fire ſo ſtrangely kindled round about the wals of his beſt hopes and ſtrengths, fals ſeriouſly to counſell at the Monaſtery of Carthuſian Monkes neere Richmond, where after exact deliberation it was decreed, 1. That generall pardon (to ſtay the mindes of as many as it was poſſible) ſhould without any exception be proclaimed to ſuch as from thenceforth ſhould continue dutifull. Which was principally done to temper, and aſſure ſome priuate perſons, as Sir Thomas Broughton and others, whoſe forces, wils, and wealth were held moſt in ſuſpition. 2. That Elizabeth, late wife to Edward the fourth, and Mother in law to Henry now King of England, ſhould forfeit all her lands and goods, for that (contrary to her faith giuen to them, who were in the plot for bringing in King Henry) ſhee had yeelded vp her daughters to the hands of the Tyrant Richard. 3. That Edward Earle of Warwicke then priſoner in the Tower, ſhould be openly ſhewed aliue in London. All which was accordingly executed, but without any great fruit, for ſtill the plot went on.

(16) The condemnation of Elizabeth Queene Dowager, rather moued enuy towards Henry, then relieued his cauſe; for, to many the juſtice of that ſentence was doubtfull, the circumſtance of a Mother in law inferred a breach of pietie, and the judgement it ſelfe did alſo want example. The juſtice was doubtfull both in regard of the cauſe, and of the proceeding: Of the cauſe, for how could ſhe haue defended her Daughters by the priuiledge of Sanctuary from ſuch a Wolfe and Tyger, as would haue infringed it for her Sonnes; had they not beene quietly deliuered to his bloudy hands? The ſame Tyrant doth now demand her Daughters, as to honour, not to ſlaughter; but if it had beene to ſlaughter, what helpe? She, terrified with the motion, after much deliberation yeelds them to him, when ſhee neither could nor durſt detaine them. But you ſay ſhe violated her faith, and hazarded thereby the liues and hopes of all that were in the plot for her cauſe. A great crime certainely. But Richard was in title, and power a King, and hung ouer her head with ineuitable terrours; when Henry of Richmond was but an Earle, and he farre off, and in baniſhment, and without any apparence of preuailing, and her ſelfe a friendleſſe widdow. The manner or proceeding was no leſſe ſtrange; for by what law or triall was ſhe condemned in a Præmunire? She neuertheleſſe is put out of all, and confined to the Monaſtery of Bermondſey in Southwarke, where finally ſhe ended her dayes, borne to be an example of both fortunes, hauing from a forlorne Widdowes eſtate beene raiſed to the Bed of a Batchelour Monarcke; and in his life time beene reduced to the ſeeming of a priuate fortune, when her Lord was driuen to flie the Land; and afterward ſaw thoſe turnes and varieties as few Queenes euer felt, or ſaw ſo many, or more contrary; whither wee regard the height of worldly felicity, when ſhe did behold her Sonne a King, or the depth of miſery, when the Tyrant inuaded his Crowne and life, or now her Daughter being Queene, and her ſelfe a miſerable priſoner. The conſideration whereof, as it may worthily mortifie ambitious affections; ſo the ſtrangeneſſe of the ſentence verifies that collection among others, which * that learned Gentleman makes of this Kings raigne, in theſe words: Hee had (ſaith hee) a verie ſtrange kinde of interchanging verie large and vnexpected pardons with ſeuere executions. Neuertheleſſe, (his wiſdome conſidered) it could not be imputed to any inequality, but to a diſcretion, or at leaſt to a principle, that hee had apprehended, that it was not good, obſtinately to purſue one courſe, but to try both wayes. Howſoeuer that was; certainely, ſhee being ſo juſt an object of his commiſeration, who had married that Daughter, by which he enjoyed a Kingdome, and gotten that very power, wherewith hee ruined her; it cannot be reaſonably thought, but that there were other moſt important motiues, perſwading ſuch a ſharpe courſe, or otherwiſe, that it muſt be reckoned among the chiefe of his errours. But as in the times of her flouriſhing eſtate, ſhe founded and endowed a faire Colledge for Students in Cambridge, which of her is called the Queenes; ſo we will leaue to thoſe her Beneficiaries the farther ſearch of this Argument, and deploration of her fortune, which ſeemes ſuch to vs, as if King Henry affected to leaue ſomewhat in this example, wherewith to oppoſe and amaze the World. Vnleſſe perhaps it were, that hauing proclaimed a generall pardon for all offences, without exception, to ſuch as in future ſhould remaine loyall, and fore-ſeeing that ſome, who might be willing to lay hold of that benefit, might alſo be cunningly practiſed-with to fall away, vpon diſtruſt of his word, when once he had ſerued his preſent vſes, he therefore meant (by ſo cleare a demonſtration, as the vtter vndoing, and perpetuall impriſonment of his wiues owne mother;) to giue them aſſurance, that he, who vpon her perſon had beene ſo ſeuere a puniſher of faith-breach, would neuer Iohn de la Pole Earle of Lincolne, and others, flie to the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy.

(17) Yet neyther could this deuiſe take ſo good effect, but that Iohn Earle of Lincolne (ſonne of Iohn de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth King Edward the fourths ſiſter) ſecretly fled into Flanders to the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, whither Francis Lord Louel was likewiſe not long before eſcaped. Sir Thomas Broughton (another principall confederate) temporized in England, there to remaine a ſtay to the buſineſſe, as well for mutuall intelligence, as receipt of an Army when it ſhould arriue. This Earle of Lincolne, beſides that he could not with any patience behold a Lancaſtrian weilding the Engliſh Scepter; was alſo of a * ſharpe wit, and high reach, and therefore not without an ambitious ſenſibility, that in countenancing King Henry, hee wronged that expectancie, and relation to the Crowne, which hee had in right of his Mother, ſiſter to King Edward the fourth, and to King Richard the third, who had *deſigned him for heire apparant, and contracted his ſiſter the * Lady Anne de la Pole, to Iames Prince of Scotland: was alſo the rather animated by * letters receiued from his Aunt the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, earneſtly calling vpon him for his preſence. This Dutcheſſe was the ſecond wife of Charles Duke of Burgundie, * ſlaine by the Switz at the battell of Nancè; by whom though hee had no iſſue, yet by reaſon of her great dower, and wiſe behauiour among the Dutch, ſhe was ſtrong in money and friends; all which ſhe was willing to conuert to the vtter ſubuerſion, howſoeuer, of the Lancaſtrian line. Though therfore, ſhe well knew that this Lambert was but an Idoll, * hammered out of the hote braine of that Boutefew Richard Simon, yet ſhe embraceth the occaſion, countenanceth the Impoſture, and leaues nothing vnſaid or vndone, which might giue life and ſucceſſe to the enterpriſe. The Earle, the L. Louell, and others, ſhe furniſhed abundantly, and joyneth vnto them a renowmed Coronell Martin Swart, a Gentleman of * honorable birth, exemplary valour, and ſingular experience, and certaine ſelected Companies, to the number of about two thouſand Almaines, which ſoone after arriue at Dublin. Lambert, who before was but proclaimed, is now in Chriſts Church there ſolemnely by them crowned King of England, * feaſting and triumphing, rearing mighty ſhouts and cryes, carrying him thence to the Kings Caſtell vpon tall mens ſhoulders, that he might be ſeene and noted; as he was ſurely (ſaith Stow) an honourable boy to looke vpon; though nothing leſſe was meant, then that he ſhould enjoy that honour if they preuailed; as meaning then to erect Edward Earle of Warwicke. Poſterity might worthily doubt of the truth of theſe ſo deſperate impudencies, and ridiculous Pageants, practiſed in the higheſt affaires of mankinde, but that the thing is ſo vniuerſally teſtified, and alſo that the higheſt affaires of the world (when once they are paſſed) are little better then ſuch like Pageants.

(18) King Henry (on the other ſide) though he had by moſt diligent eſpials endeuoured to know the truth of Lamberts quality, to diuert the ſtreame of affections, which he ſaw inclined that way, for that the practiſe was carried with ſuch wonderfull art, as that very many (otherwiſe diſcreet and ſober men) were induced to beleeue that he was indeede King Edwards ſonne; and although the generall pardon proclaimed by King Henry, did vndoubtedly ſtay very many from open reuolt, but much more the carefull watch which was kept at the Ports, to hinder the eſcape of Malecontents or factious Fugitiues: yet he manifeſtly ſaw, that it would in the end come to a Field: for which cauſe he takes order for the leuie of an Armie, reſoluing to giue his enemies Battell with the firſt opportunity, it being the ancient and manfull faſhion of the Engliſh (who are naturally moſt impatient of lingring miſchiefes) to put their publique quarrels to the triall of the ſword. Lambert attended with Iohn Earle of Lincolne, Francis Lord * Vicount Louell, Thomas Fitz-Gerald, or rather Maurice Fitz-Thomas (belike his ſonne) and Coronell Swart, with an Army of deſperate and pickt Souldiers, as well Engliſh, Dutch, as Iriſh (all fired with infinite hopes and promiſes to be enjoyed vpon the ouerthrow of King Henry) come on ſhoare in Lancaſhire at a place called the pile of Fowdray, where they joyne with their aſſured Confederate Sir Thomas Broughton, and his ſequell; and after ſome ſhort refreſhment in thoſe parts, march with erected courages againſt King Henry, taking their way through Yorkeſhire (the hoped Nurſery of their ſureſt friendſhips) and glorioully publiſhing their new King euery where, though without any increaſe of force by concourſe, (for King Henries wiſdome had marred their errand,) their journey was directed toward Newarke vpon Trent.

Thither repaired George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, George Lord Strange his ſonne, Sir Iohn Cheinie, and other noble and valiant Gentlemen with their numbers, which added no ſmall ſinewes to King Henries muſters. Polydor * hath diligently ſet downe the names of ſuch principall men in thoſe parts as repayred thither, partly voluntary, partly ſent-for to the common defence of the King and Kingdome; but without due additions of each mans degree and place of precedency; yet their names doe well deſerue to be remembred, both for the honour of their Families, and examples of loyalty. Hee recounteth ſixtie fiue Captaines which aſſembled from places thereabout, vnder whom there cannot probably be thought fewer Souldiers then eight or tenne thouſand, the Engliſh vſually, till of late, hauing commonly an hundreth and fiftie in a Company. Their ſurnames (beſides Edward Lord * Haſtings) are in him as followeth; Longford, Montgomerie, Vernon of the Peke, Shurley, Folgehan, Griſley, Sutton, Stanley, and Stanley, Houghton, Meryng, Stanhop, Clifton, Stapleton, Willoughby, Perpoinct, Babington, Bedyll, * Brudenel, Markham, Merbury, Borough, Tyrwit, Huſey, Sheſeild, Newport, Ormeſton, Tempeſt, Knyuett, Willoughby, Dygby, and Dygby, Harrington, Sacheuerel, Vyllers, Fylding, Poultney, Vaux, Gryne, Gryfin, Lucy, Belknap, Throgmorton, Gray of Ruthin, Wolſton, Fynder, Philips, Cheney, Cotton, *S. The Earle of Lincolne neuertheleſſe comes forward with his Counter-King, nothing perhaps adding greater courage to that ſide, then the example of Henry himſelfe, who with leſſe numbers (but much more ſecret Art) preuayled in a pight field at Boſworth: his meaning was to get into Newarke. The King wakefull vpon all aduantages, and perfectly inſtructed of his enemies courſes (whom deſperation did thruſt forward to a daring hope) diſlodgeth with his Army, and paſſeth through Newarke, leauing it behinde him about three miles, to intercept the Lambertines; and there ſits downe againe. The battell of Stoke, or Stokefield.

(22) The Earle of Oxford, (on the behalfe of the whole Army) was prepared to make anſwere, but the King haſtening to the proofe, brake off all Ceremonies; and the ſigne of Battell giuen, they thunder forward with ſhouts of people, and ſound of martiall muſicke, and like a blacke tempeſt, powre themſelues vpon the Front of the Enemies Battels; who ruſhed forward with equall violence and furie, as men that at once encountred againſt feare and fortune. The fight continued doubtfull aboue * three houres. A long ſpace for men of courage to be employed in killing one the other, and fit to glut the hunger of furie. The Earles Engliſh wanted nothing but a good cauſe, and the Almains gaue not place to the Kings people in any poynt worthy of gallant Souldiers, but ſold their liues dearely, and their Coronell Swart had ſcarce any before him in perſonall performance. Neither were the Iriſh behinde for their parts, if their skinnes had beene ſword-proofe, for the contempt of death was alike in them as the reſt. Briefly, the wonder of that dayes worke was, that Chriſtian men, in no ſounder a quarrell, could dare to die ſo boldly, ſuch chiefly, as the Earle of Lincolne and ſome others, who knew the ſecret of that deſperate enterprize. But God, the Lord of reuenges; puniſhing their vnjuſt malice, with a ſuddaine whirlewinde, riſing in the heate of the Battell, (euen as when Conſtantine fought againſt the enemies of the Church) our ſouldiers, who ſeemed vanquiſhed, became victorious. For the Kings vant-gard *re-enforced it ſelfe, and gaue ſo furious a re-charge, (in likelihood vpon this encouragement ſent as it were from Heauen) that it vtterly brake the Enemies ſquadrons, and giuing in among them with full randon, ſlew * firſt ſuch Captaines as reſiſted, and put the reſidue which yeelded not, either to the ſword or flight. Herewith the whole Armie * ſhouted, the Trumpets ſound victory, and the generall crie runnes King Henrie, King Henrie. When the batte l and chaſe were ended, ſo that there was time and leaſure to view the field, it then appeared what mindes the ſlaine bodies carried; for all the chiefe Captaines, the Earle of Lincolne himſelfe (though the King would gladly haue had him ſaued, to come thereby to a greater light of his dangers) the Lord Louell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Coronell Swart, and * Maurice Fitz-Thomas, Generall of the Iriſh, were (like * Catiline and his Complices) found to couer thoſe places dead, which they defended liuing, among foure thouſand other Souldiers which were ſlaine vpon that ſide. sadors in the meane time negociating with the Scottish King, wrought * him to be more inclinable to a perpetuall peace; then it stood with his safetie to let his Subjects vnderstand, who fauoured him not. Seauen yeares truce is consented vnto, with a secret promise of King Iames to renew that terme, as it began to expire; with which assurance the Ambassadours returning, gladded their wise Soueraignes heart; who thereby found that the Bishop of Excester, was no lesse industrious in preseruing his Regall state, then he had beene prudent in furthering Him vnto it. The fire-brands and readiest fuell of Rebellion thus seemed to be quenched, and the King beholds himselfe in the Grace and fauour of his people, nor lesse of forraine Princes; Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundy (his implacable* Iuno) excepted; whom the newes of her Nephewes the Earle of Lincolnes death, and the bloudy blowing vp of all her late hopefull and costly contriuements, did gall and wound extreamely; but added fresh appetites of reuenge to her former immortall malice, which * neuer gaue ouer working, till she had vented another no lesse prodigy then Lambert was. (24) The next maine action which sifted the judgement, and tride the sinnewes of King Henry, was a forraigne case, of more difficulty and Art, then of intestine danger, as in which the high and paramount respects of Common-weale were intangled, or encountred with offices most neerely concerning the honour of a Princes minde, which neuer is more blemished then with the note of ingratitude. A dispute and combate betweene wisdome and bloud, publique and priuate, (if any quality, or action of a King may be said to be priuate) which seemed worthy of so excellent, cleare, and considerate a discourse, as that of Henries. You heard what notable fauours and humanities, when he liued a banisht Earle in the Continent, he had receiued, first of the Duke of Britain, then of Charles K. of France; so that hee stood equally (as it were) obliged to them both, and could acknowledge no lesse. Charles (more ambitiously then justly) desired exceedingly to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France, taking occasion of the time, and other circumstances, which all seemed to conspire with his affections. The Duke olde, and the father of one onely daughter suruiuing till marriage; Maximilian King of Romans, and riuall of King Charles in the same desires, (as well for the Dutchy, as the Daughter,) feeble in meanes; and King Henry as well obnoxious to the French for benefits, as busied in his particular at home: and the Duke of Britaine, by succouring Lewis Duke of Orleance, and other French Lords, whom King Charles reputed his aduersaries, ministred to the French an occasion (or colour at least) of warring vpon Britaine, and so by the apt concurrence of circumstances, to annexe it by conquest, if by treaty hee could not. Henry of England now knowne to be victoriously setled, seemes worth the Courting. Ambassadors come from the French, who lay open the wrong offered by the Britaines, in succouring the enemies of France, put Henry in minde of passed benefits; and pray his assistance, or at the least a neutrality; but altogether concealing the mystery of this warre, which was to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France. Howsoeuer, Henry, though he well enough knew, that a King must euer bee the best part of his Councell, (for what are others opinions, if himselfe want the happinesse, or iudgement, to choose the best?) propounds the points to his priuy Councell, wherupon he Christianly offers himselfe a Mediatour betweene the French and Britaine; an office, in which it was apparant hee might best satisfie all obligations and duties both to God and them. The French pretend liking, but in the meane time follow their designe hard. Henry sends his Chaplen M^r. Christopher Vrswicke a man * whom he very often imployed. The French maske on. Things come to some extremities. It becomes manifest that King Charles abused the King of Englands credulity; for the City of Nants in Britaine was brought by siege to point of yeelding, while messengers, and packets, outwardly oyled with the name of peace, slide to and fro, and the French doubt nothing so much, as lest the English should stirre, before their victory had made Britaine irrecouerable. The Lord Wooduile (as without the Kings will, or priuity) slips ouer into Britaine with three or foure hundred choise men, to assist the Duke, and came time enough to be slaine with almost all his Souldiers, at the battell of Saint Albine, where the French wanne the day; notwithstanding that the Britaines, the rather to appall their enemies, had apparelled * seauenteene hundred of their own Souldiers in white Coates with red Crosses, after the English manner, & made therby a shew of two Regiments of English. The Britaines had a great losse in that battell, wherein they were made fewer by sixe thousand. The Duke of Orleance and Prince of Orange, who then were British in faction, were taken prisoners in the same fight. The French lost about twelue hundreth, and their Generall an Italian. So that the state of Britaine seemed ripe for a fall.

A difficult case, whether King Henry should aide the Britaines or no.

(25) But King Henry, hauing long since suspected, and fore-seene, what the vttermost marke of the French might be, and seeming to haue enough suffered the interest, which they might expect in him as a man, to be abused by their practises, to the preiudice of his other friend, the Duke of Britaine, (who forgat not to sollicite and vrge that point) had made the quality of this affaire knowne to the body of State in open Parliament, for that purpose assembled; as meaning by authority thereof to purge himselfe from all imputation, if, as a King, he did that which the reason of Gouernment required, which would not assent that Britaine should be made French, lest by that accession their Neighbourhood might grow intollerable, Britaine hauing so many Sea-townes and Out-lets to mischiefe the English *traffick*e. Himselfe was otherwise also sufficiently resolued, that the generall good ought to predominate the particular, & that his priuate obligations ought not to entangle, or preiudice the publike seruice. The Parliament therfore, considering that which stood for the Common-weale, decrees aide of men and money, on behalfe of the Duke of Britaine; it being (besides all other respects) a perillous example, to suffer the great to deuoure the lesser Neighbour-States, vpon pretences of iustice, or reuenge. Forces are leuied; but (for respect of King Charles, and in hope that the shew of preparations would stoope him to equall conditions,) not yet so roundly, as the Britaines necessities expected. Meanewhile that no formality or Princely Ceremony should be vn-accomplished, King Henrie by his Ambassadors certifies King Charles of his Parliaments decree; prayes him to desist from farther Hostility; otherwise that he must assist the Duke, but yet (for the French Kings sake) with this reseruation, of pursuing his subiects no where but in Britaine. Charles made small account of these ouertures, because hee truely perswaded himselfe that the English aides would not arriue in season; which fell out accordingly; for before that time, the French had gotten that victory, (whereof euen now wee spake) at the Battell of Saint Albine. The whole Army contained eight thousand men. These march toward the enemy; who, acquainted with the temper of the English, whiles they are fresh, as * being then almost inuincible, containe themselues within their Campe; but yet * Polyd.Virg. moleste the English with continuall skirmishes on horse-backe in seuerall places at once; smally to the profit of the French, who * * *Hollinsh. In the meane space, Francis Duke of Britaine dyes, leauing in effect, one onely daughter, the Lady Anne, (for the other, * * Polyd.Virg. being the younger) deceased not long after. This altered the whole state of the case. The British Nobility (vnder their young Mistresse) immediately fall at variance among themselues, and the English thereby were on euery hand in danger: so that God (as it appeared by the sequell) had destined Britaine to be annexed to the Crowne of France; for the English (after fiue moneths stay) were in wisdome compelled to returne; the rather, for that Winter now was come vpon them, and Britaine, destitute of competent defence, (her Rulers disagreeing among themselues) was finally by the marriage of King Charles with the Lady Anne, made a parcell of the French Monarchy, as hereafter will appeare.

(26) King Henry the while was againe in danger to haue had present vse of Souldiers at home. We shewed, what care was heretofore taken by him to weede the North, and free it from lurking enemies. That notwithstanding, when the Earle of Northumberland, (Lieutenant of the North) signified at an Assembly (according as the truth was) that the King (though the Northerne people had besought it) would not remit one penny of such Subsidy, as was granted in Parliament for supportation of the warres in Britaine, * leste the Acts of State should be reuersed at the rude peoples pleasure; but that on the contrary, Commission and warrant was sent downe for him to see the same leuyed by distresse, or otherwise: the desperate multitude, falsely supposing that the Earle was the occasion of such an answere, did suddenly set vpon him at the incitement of one Iohn à Chamber, and furiously murdered him, with certaine of his seruants in a place called Cocklegge by Thrusk, eighteene miles from Yorke. They to carry their wicked attempt through, make head vnder Sir Iohn Egremond, a discontented Knight of those parts, openly declaring where they came, that their meaning was to fight with the King in defence of their liberties, as if the causeless killing of a most noble Lord had beene one of them. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey sent from Court with some forces to represse their increase, skirmisheth with a route of these Rebels, beats them away, and takes Iohn à Chamber prisoner. The whole swarme flockes to Yorke, where they roosted about three or foure dayes, when hearing of the Kings approach (who was euer one of the first in the necke of such occasions) they scattered themselues, but the ring-leaders were hanged and quartered, and Iohn à Chamber, with some others, were executed at Yorke after an extraordinary manner. Sir Iohn Egremond escaping, fled to the common Center of all King Henries dangers and enmities, Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundy, so that though the colour of rising was about money, yet Egremond at least had reference, it seemes, to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, vpon the old ground of quarrell (hatred of the Lancastrian Familie) and this to be but a sparke or flash of that great and troubleous fire, which afterward brake forth and blazed so prodigiously. The Earle of Surrey is left by the King (hauing * Bern.Andr.M.S. seuerely punished the murtherers) Lieutenant of the North, and Sir Robert Tonstall Knight, as chiefe Commissioner for leuying the taxe or subsidie.

(27) The vnworthy death of the Earle of Northumberland, was seconded by a more vnworthy, of Iames the third King of Scotland, so as King Henry lost at home a most honourable stay of his Northerne affaires, and a sure Ally abroad. This vnfortunate Prince, hauing * by some irregularity of life, and partialities, and errours of gouernement (amplified perhaps by the constructions and reports of his malignant Subjects) incurred extreame hatred with many of the Nobility and people, laboured with * King Henry, as also with the Pope, and King of France, to make an accord betweene him and his Mutinadoes, for that they had compelled Prince Iames, his Sonne, to be the titular and vnnaturall Head of those armes, which traiterously (as pretending to haue a right on behalfe of the Common-weale to depose an euill King) they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their mediations by earnest Ambassadors, but could obtaine no other then this outragious answere: That there was no talking of peace, vnlesse hee would resigne his Crowne. King Henry and King Charles vehemently protested against these their whole proceedings, declaring by their Ambassadour, that they thought the same to be as a common injury done vnto themselues; and the example to be very wicked and pernicious, and not sufferable by Princes, that Subjects should be permitted to put hands vnto their Soueraigne. Hereupon it came to a Battell at Banocksborne by Striuelin, whereat King Iames (rashly fighting before his whole numbers were come) was notwithstanding the contrarie commaundement of the Prince his Sonne) slaine in the Mill of that Field, whither he fled after the Battell ended. By reason of this infortunate precipitation of the Scottish King, Hadrian de Castello an Italian Legate, whom Pope Innocentius the eight had sent to take vp the cruell quarrell, came too late, (for he arriued not in England till the Battell at Banocksborne was passed,) but not too late to receiue honour at the hands of King Henry, who respecting his wisdome and excellent learning, (vpon the speciall commendations first * of Iohn Morton Archbishop of Canterburie, but afterward vpon his owne experience of the Man in sundry employments to the Roman Sea,) bestowed vpon him the Bishopricke of Hereford, and (after resignation thereof) the Bishopricke of Bath and Welles; who was also at the length created Cardinall by Pope Alexander the sixth. * But who is hee among many thousands (saith Polydor) that vseth not to admire these outward honours which may alike be giuen to the vnworthy as well as to the well-deseruing, and may alike be taken away from eyther? But the prayse of this Hadrian is of another farre more noble kinde and eternall: for hee was the man who first reuiued the glory of the ancient Latine eloquence, and of all other sorts of abstruse and exquisite learnings, as in which himselfe exceiled. Thus doth Polydor (himselfe an Italian,) celebrate the learning of his Country-man, of whose other qualities, yet others write more harshly; as that out of meere ambition to be Pope, (without any other grudge) he conspired with Alphonso Petruccio, and other sacred Cardinals, to murther Pope Leo the tenth: induced thereto by suggestion of a Witch, who fore-told him that one Hadrian, an old man, of meane parentage, of great learning and wisdome, should succeed in the Papacy. The man thought it must needs be himselfe, as being, though of very base Parentage, yet of some noble qualities: but another * Hadrian, the sonne of a Dutch Brewer, and instructer of Charles the fifth the Emperour, prooued to be the man; and this our Hadrian lost by depriuation all his promotions whatsoeuer, for his nefarious attempt. Into such extreame folly is learning and wisdome metamorphosed, where it is tainted with Ambition, or wants a Religious discretion to manage it aright.

those which were far more apt for the seruice of God, and for attaining of knowledge, then in martiall tumults; yet the qualitie of his super-eminent place enuied vnto him that felicitie; for hee was necessarily drawne into a war with France vpon lesse occasions. Anne the young Dutchesse of Britaine, (by their aduise, who affected to preserue the liberty of that Dukedome, which by vnion with France, would be absorpt and extinguished) had so farre entangled and engaged her selfe with the Procurators of Maximilian King of Romans, that she was not onely publiquely contracted, but contented (for vttermost performance of those rites whereof marriage by proxie was honorably capable) to take vpon her the Bride, and being solemnly bedded; to permit Maximilians Deputie, in the presence of sundry Noble witnesses, as well men as women, to put in his legge, stript naked to the knee, betweene the spousall sheetes, that ceremony seeming to amount to a Consummation. Charles King of France, notwithstanding these solemnities, and his owne particular engagement with the Lady Margaret daughter of Maximilian, (whom for the purpose of marriage he had already entertained into France,) did so ambitiously and vehemently couet to gaine Britaine, that vpon confidence of his force, he resolued to breake through all respects, and not onely to offend all his forraine friends, but to make them his just enemies, rather then to faile in effectuation. Instruments are therefore very secretly set on worke, and battery is placed with bags of gold at all the opportunities which might let in his purpose. Ambassadors also (the* Lord Francis of Luxemburg, Charles Marinian, and Robert Gagwine,* Generall of the Order of the holy Trinitie, are dispatched to Henrie, praying that with his good-will he might dispose of the body of the Lady Anne in marriage, according to the right which he had thereunto, as the chiefe Lord of whom she held the Dukedome. Henry denied the request, but yeelded notwithstanding to send Ambassadors into France there to Capitulate about a peace. The French carryed this affaire with notable Art, for to diuert the world for looking into the depth of their drift, King Charles still detained the young Lady Margaret, Maximilians daughter; so as at most it could be but suspected, that Charles meant to match her with some of his bloud, and all the entercourse of Orators and Ambassadors vsed in the meane time, tended but to hold the English busied vpon other objects, till they had wrought their feate in the Court of Britaine. For Maximilian, (to let the world see what injuries shall be offered euen to Kings, that are not strong) him they altogether neglected; King Henry they played with, and Ferdinando King of Castile (who was ready to joyne with Maximilian and *Henrie against the French) they resolue to appease, with rendring vp vnto him the Counties of Ruscinoon, and Perpinian; as accordingly they* did, without re-emburſement of one penny of those 300000. Crownes, for which Iohn King of Arragon (father to Ferdinando) had morgaged them. The young Ladies doubts, rising either out of Religion, or poynt of honour, his cunning Agents, and Emissaries wipe away with these solutions: That Maximilians daughter was not of yeares to consent, and therefore the contract between King Charles and her, did not binde either in law, or conscience: That her owne contract with Maximilian was void, for that it was done without the consent of her Soueraigne Lord, King Charles, whose ward or Client she was. The Ladie vanquished in her judgement with these reasons, attracted with the present greatnes of King Charles, and loath by refusall to make her Countrey the seate of a long and miserable warre, secretly yeelded to accept of another husband. Thomas Goldstone Abbot of S. Augustines in Canterbury, and Thomas Earle of Ormond in Ireland, King Henries Ambassadors into France, hauing beene dandled by the French during these illusiue practises, returned without other fruite of their labours.

(29) What could now the most patient doe lesse then take sword in hand vpon so palpable and vnworthy illusion? But Maximilians wrongs were too impudent and intollerable; for Charles sent home the Lady Margaret, and married the Inheritrix of Britaine, annexing it to his owne Realme: whereas King Henrie found himselfe rather mockt, then otherwise empayred. Iames Contibald hereupon comes Ambassadour from Maximilian, and obtayned his request; which was, that they with ioynt forces should by a certaine day prefixed, inuade the French, in full reuenge of these their bold prouocations; Maximilian for his part, promising to support that warre with at least ten thousand men for two yeares. King Henrie hauing formerly in abundant manner prouided himselfe of treasure, was ready before the day with a royall armie: but Maximilian (whose will to worke the vttermost mischiefe to France was not doubted,) being sent vnto by King Henry, signifying his forwardnesse, was found vtterly vnfurnished. Causes of Maximilians weaknesse in state, were the Rebellions and dislikes of his Flemish Subjects, cherished by the French, the jealousie of Princes neighbourhood, making them vnjustly glad either of others molestations. For subduing whereof, though King Henrie had heretofore giuen him good and successefull assistance, vnder the conduct of Giles Lord Dawbeney, Gouernour of Callis, the Lord Morley, and others, whereby he the rather ouercame; yet was he the feebler, as then, by reason of so fresh exhaustures. King Henrie with good cause was not a little troubled at these newes, secretly signified by his trustie Almner Mr. Christopher Vrswick, and Sir Richard Risley Knight, his Ambassadors to Maximilian; For he was very loath to vndergoe so great an Action vpon his particular strengths, though he doubted not to finde a potent party among the Britaines, (whose affections were as yet but loosely setled toward King Charles,) and yet farre more loath to deceiue the expectation of his owne people, who had so largely contributed; Chiefely the Citie of London, out of which, euen in those dayes, he receiued for his furniture in that voyage almost * ten thousand pounds from the Commoners, and (as it seemes by our Author) two hundreth pounds besides from euery Alderman, where the same King could not, but with some difficulty, leuy in the third yeare of his Raigne a loane of foure thousand pounds, whereof three of the best Companies are noted (as for hauing done and deserued extraordinarily) to haue lent aboue nine hundred. And verily this wise King (knowing how great a strength that rich Citie was vnto him) humored that people with all sorts of popularities, for himselfe did not onely come among them, and cause himselfe to be entred a Brother, in * one of their Companies, but ware the habite at a publike Feast, and sate as Maister, as is very credibly reported out of the Records of their Hall. His wisdome therefore saw, that in giuing ouer the inuasion of France; hee should loathfully abandon a goodly occasion of making himselfe vniuersally acceptable to his people. His resolutions therefore are by him at least-wise pretended to continue, and for that cause he sufficiently encreaseth his numbers, that hee might seeme able to goe through with that enterprize alone; and though the time of yeare were too farre spent (for he landed not at Callis, till the sixth day of October) yet marcheth he with his whole forces toward Boloigne, being wel assured that with this trowell he should at once plaister two wals, that is, humor his English subjects, and for a peace draw to himselfe store of Crownes from the French.

(31) Boloigne was brought to ſome diſtreſſe, when by interuention of this agreement it remained ſafe and quiet: King Charles was chiefly moued to buy his peace at a deare rate, both for that the ſtate of Britaine was as yet vnſetled, and for that hee meant forthwith to march into Italy for the * conqueſt of the Kingdome of Naples; and King Henry on the other ſide was not vnwilling, becauſe Maximilian had fayled, and Britaine ſeemed clearely paſt poſſibilitie of euiction. To which may be added, a naturall, noble, and religious inclination in King Henry, to liue in amity with his neighbours; the inckling of new * dangers, then in brewing againſt him by the turbulent, and vnappeaſeable Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, and * cheriſhed by King Charles; and laſtly, the enrichment of himſelfe by re-emburſing the charges both of this, and the Britiſh warre, out of the French elſewhere, whereby he ſhould farre the better be able to withſtand all forraine practiſes, or domeſticke outrages. As for the preſeruing of himſelfe, and his honour with his Subjects, he wanted not both true and honourable gloſſes: Such as were the care to auoyde vnneceſſary effuſion of Chriſtian bloud: the vſes of his preſence at home, beſides many other: but his wiſdome in the carriage of this right weighty action was chiefly eminent in this: That he would not enter into Treatie, till he was in the Field; and that with ſuch a puiſſance, as was likely enough to force his owne conditions; nor ſuffer the leaſt ſigne of his ſecret willingneſſe to peace, or inward doubt of troubles at home, to creepe out at any Crany or Chinke of his diſcourſe or carriage, whereby hee as farre outwent the French fairely, as they formerly ſeemed to haue ouer-wrought him ſubtlely. Had they truely beene informed in thoſe poynts, it is probable they might haue gone a cheaper way to worke: for, beſides what other Articles ſoeuer, it was concluded, That Henry ſhould * not quit his claime to France; but that for a Peace, which by the contract was onely to continue during the two Kings liues, Charles of France ſhould pay in preſent to Henry for his charges in that warre, * ſeauen hundred fortie and fiue thouſand * Duckets, and twentie fiue thouſand Crownes yearely toward the expenſes which hee had heretofore been at in aiding the Britains. Which (by the Engliſh called Tibute) was duely paide during all this Kings raigne, and alſo to Henry his Son, till the whole debt was run out, thereby to preſerue amity with England. There were moreouer (by Henries conſent, who was thus content to gratifie his Peeres at anothers coſt) not onely preſent rewards, but alſo certaine annuall penſions allotted to the chiefe Lords of his Priuie-Councell. A courſe of bounty which might otherwiſe haue proued prejudicious to the ſeruice of the King of England, by engaging his Counſellors affections to the French: The ſiege of Boloigne laſted till the eight day of Nouember, and Henry (whom his Queens moſt *tender, frequent, and louing lines, did the rather inuite to ſpeedieſt returne,) hauing ſetled all his tranſmarine affaires, *arriued at Douer, from whence he journied to Weſtminſter, there to celebrate the Feaſt of Chriſtmas. (32) The famous counterfeiſance of Perkin Warbecke, with which the braine of the Ladie Margaret Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundy had long trauelled, doth now begin to diſcloſe it ſelfe, and make new buſineſſes for King Henry. The inglorious glorie of the firſt inuention in his raigne of this kinde of vexation, Lambert Simnels perſon had giuen to his Maſter the wily Simon, ſo that our Dutcheſſe was but an imitatrix, and yet perhaps ſhe gaue not place in any poynt to the firſt example, or Archtype, neuertheleſſe the fortune of the firſt deuiſe, being no more ſucceſſefull then it was, might reaſonably haue deterred her from the edition of a ſecond: but whether it were an immortall enuie toward the Lancaſtrian race, or a burning zeale of aduancing one that might at leaſtwiſe beare the name of a Plantagenet, though by any ſiniſter practiſes; as if it had beene lawfull to attaine her ends (admit them iuſt) by any iniurious courſes, ſhee reſolues to erect another Idoll, as perceiuing by the firſt, how notable an engine impoſture was, to trouble Henry; being well aſſured, that England was ful of corrupt humors, and ill-affections to worke vpon, not ſo much through the deſert of her preſent King, as for that the dregges which naturally reſide in the bottom of mens hearts, where moſt bloudy and barbarous factions haue for a long time weltered, and wurried one the other with various euent, were not cleanſed and auoyded. The Diuell therefore ready to furniſh all attempts which may raiſe trouble, and miſchiefe, eaſily fitted her. There was come therefore to her hands a youth adorned with ſuch a ſhape, as might eaſily perſwade the beholders was worthy of a noble fortune: he had thereunto a naturall fine wit, and (by reaſon of his abode in England in K. Edwards daies) could ſpeake our language, as alſo ſome other, which hee had by a kind of wandring trauell obtained. This youth was borne (they ſay) in the City of Torney, and called Peter Warbecke*, the *ſon of a conuerted Iew, whoſe God-father at Baptiſme King Edward himſelfe was. The Engliſh in * contempt (and for a note perhaps of his forraine birth) did afterward call him by a diminutiue of his name, Peterkin or Perkin. Him the Dutcheſſe (as a fit peece of timber, out of which to carue a new Idoll) moulds by degrees, and makes him take ſhape according to that Idæa which ſhe had prefigured in her working imagination, before the which the late honours of her houſe, conſpicuous in three Princes (which altogether made not twentie and fiue yeares of raigne) did ſo perpetually houer, as her ſoule could neuer take contentment, but in the hope that the Houſe of Yorke ſhould againe be the dwelling place of Majeſty.

onely her brother, but the whole male-line of her Family was for euer to be excluded; much leſſe could ſhe (a Plantagenet) abide that Henry, who brought to the Crowne the ſur-name of a newly raiſed Family. Theſe and other conſiderations in the breaſt of a Lady, bred vp in a dominating Family, her ſelfe a Dowager, in ſuch a fortune, as in which ſhe was Paramount for the time, and abſolute without controlment, being careleſſe withall of ſauing for poſteritie, becauſe ſhe was without a Childe, and in that regard the more abundantly ſtored with treaſure; all which made her ſpirits ouer-boyle with impatience and virulency; ſo farre forth, that hauing infuſed all her principles into Peter her creature, vnder the Title of Richard Plantagenet, ſecond Sonne of King Edward the fourth; ſhe moſt couertly ſends him into Portugall, from thence to take his Icarean flight, as * elſewhere is related. (34) That Peter Warbecke ſhould be inflamed by her fauours, and encouragements, to dare in earneſt the perſonation of a Kings ſonne, ſeemes not a thing to be admired; for there is in humane nature (which tyes not her ſelfe to Pedigrees, nor Parentages) a kinde of light matter, which will eaſily kindle, being toucht with the blazing hopes of ambitious propoſitions. He therefore vpon the firſt diſcloſe of * himſelfe, did put on ſo excellent a ſeeming as might juſtly moue King Henry to be jealous, whereunto the pernitious practiſe might come at laſt; for there wanted nothing in the whole forme of the young vp-ſtart, but onely the conſcience of a truth, and truth it ſelfe: which makes mee call to minde * what one hath written of a goodly white Saphyr in Venice, made by art ſo neerely to reſemble a true Diamond, that with much difficulty, and but by one onely lapidary, it was diſcouered; which if it had beene graced with ſome great Princes wearing, what could want to haue made it paſſable for a very Diamond of greateſt value? Perkin came ſuch from out of the Burgundian forge; and (if his parentage be reſpected) aſſumed the image and reſemblance of a King, being otherwiſe not ſo much as a meane Gentleman. Neither can it be maruelled at, if ſuch a Phantaſme as this, did abuſe, and trouble the common people of that time; for euen to ſuch as doe write thereof, it begets a kind of doubt (which without ſome little collection of their ſpirits doth not eaſily vaniſh,) it ſeeming almoſt incredible, that ſuch a bloudy play ſhould meerely be diſguiſed and fained; the diſcouery therefore was worthy ſuch a wit as King Henries, and the puſh it gaue to his ſoueraignty did throughly try his ſitting, being of force enough to haue caſt an ordinary rider out of ſaddle.

(35) Therefore, it was the Dutcheſſes misfortune, that her inuentions (if they were hers) had to encounter ſo politique and conſtant a man as King Henry; whoſe prudence ſearcht into the abſtruſeſt ſecrets, and whoſe diligence ouer-came all difficulties. Yet the Lady Margarets courſe to vent her Creature at the firſt was exquiſite; for ſhee (as in a Magicke practiſe) hauing kept him ſecret till ſhee ſaw her time, cauſeth him to be cloſely conuayed into * Portugall; from whence (attended with fit aſſociates and Priuadoes) he ſailes into Ireland (the Foſter-place and nurſery of immortall good will to the houſe of Yorke) where (notwithſtanding their late calamities,) he ſo ſtrongly enchanted that rude people with the charmes of falſe hopes, and miſts of ſeemings, as he was ſure of partakers in great plentie. Charles the eight, King of France, hearing (and perhaps beleeuing) that the Duke of Yorke was aliue, and glad to haue ſo probable an occaſion of doing miſchiefe to Henry of England, in regard of theſe flagrant enmities which as then remayned vnquencht betweene them, inuites Duke Richard moſt officiouſly to Paris, and beſides all other honours, aſſigned him (at his comming) a guard for his perſon, whereof the Lord Congreſhall was Captaine. Afterward there repayred to this new Duke, Sir George Neuill Knight, (a * baſtard of the noble houſe of the Neuils,) Sir Iohn Taylor, Rowland Robinſon, and about an hundreth Engliſh, to whom (as a principall) wee may adde * Stephen Frion, French Secretary to King Henrie himſelfe; all which, together with the whole Stratageme, was ſmoakt out of France with the firſt graine of Incenſe ſacrificed vpon the Altars of Peace at Boloigne, after the ſame was once made and ratified (as you haue heard) betweene the French and vs. The Dutcheſſe then ſeeing her artificiall creature thus turned againe vpon her hands, pretends an extreame ignorance that euer ſhe had ſeene him before that preſent, and an exceſſiue joy for his miraculous eſcape, and preſeruation, which ſeemed ſuch to her (as ſhe pretended) as if he had beene reuiued from death to life, and that the fable might want no quickning, which her perſonal countenancing, or her Court could afford, ſhee openly ſalutes him by the delicate Title of the * White Roſe of England, and queſtions him of the manner of his eſcape, with ſuch like, to beget a firme beliefe in the hearers, that ſhee neuer had ſeene him before that time, and that he was indeed her Nephew Richard Duke of Yorke. The Nobility of Flanders accordingly, doe vnto him all honour, and ſhee enuirons his perſon with a guard of thirty men in murrey and blew. Neyther was hee in any poynt wanting to his part; but fitted ſuch likely anſweres to all queſtions, and ſuch princely behauiours to all occaſions, as made fame bold to publiſh him with the fulleſt blaſt of her Trumpet, for no other then a true Richard Plantagenet; and as it is ſo obſerued of ſome, that by long vſing to report an vntruth, at laſt forgetting themſelues to be the Authors thereof, beleeue it in earneſt; ſo theſe honors making our Peter to bury in vtter obliuion his births obſcurity, hee ſeemed to be perſwaded, that he was indeed the ſelfe partie, whom hee did ſo exactly perſonate. Noueſty, and impudency were ſcarce euer knowne to haue found more applauſe, or beliefe, euen among many very wiſe, and (otherwiſe) worthy men; who moued in conſcience, and not onely vpon diſcontent, inclined to partake with this new Plantagenet, as the only right heire of the Engliſh Diadem, as if, whether he had beene the true one, it was paſt diſpute. This intoxication, and abuſion of the world, was wonderfully encreaſed by the ſecret reuolt of Sir Robert Clifford Knight, whom (as one that had ſeene, and knowne the true Richard) the cunning conſpirators in England had ſent ouer, to informe himſelfe, and them, whether he was indeed as he ſeemed. Sir Robert (whoſe preſence and errand were to the Dutcheſſe moſt welcome,) being brought to his ſight, did forthwith giue credite, and conſtantly ſignifie, that this was indeed Richard Plantagenet, the true Duke of Yorke, and that he well knew him for ſuch. Money and encouragements, were hereupon ſent out of England, from ſuch as fauoured him, among whom was * Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain to King Henry (by whoſe punctuall reuolt from K. Richard, he had principally atchieued the Crowne of England) * Iohn Ratcliffe, L. Fitzwalter, * Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwates Knights, and others; but the maine countenance of the cauſe in forraine parts was Sir Robert Clifford (a Knight of an honourable fame and Family) which moued the ſecret friends of the new Duke to ſet the rumour ſo cunningly on foot among the Engliſh, that * ſooner might a cloud, which cauſeth thunder, be caught or knowne, then the Author thereof; and multitudes being weakened therewith, ſtore of humor humor, dangerously prepared to mutation, did euery where discouer it selfe.

(36) For preuention therefore of all those effects which might issue out of these causes, (being in their proper nature most generatiue of sedition, and of all sorts of ciuill furies) King Henry diligently causeth the coasts of England to be well and strongly watcht, aswell to empeach the landing of enemies, as the escape of fugitiues: but aboue all, hee writes letters to his best friends in forraigne parts, & also employes nimble wits with seuerall instructions; some to assaile the constancy of Sir Robert Clifford, (the maine stay and credite of Perkins cause) with promise of immunity and fauour if hee would returne into England in quiet; others, to finde out the truth of Perkins qualitie, being furnished with treasure to draw and requite intelligences; and all of them (as occasion should serue) to pretend themselues vehement fauorers of the new Duke. These necessarie hypocrites and double-faced Ambidexters, called Spies, (whose seruices, howsoeuer conducible to such as sets them on worke, yet their perfidious quality commonly partakes with that of Iudas Iscariot, and often meetes with like reward,) doe plye their charge so roundly that * Sir Robert Clifford is secretly drawne off, the new Duke is discouered aswell by them, as by * sundry letters from friends abroad, to bee but Perkin Warbecke, and many other mysteries are reuealed. This gaue to the wise King great satisfaction, who to weaken the enemies practise the more, not onely diuulgeth the fraud, but sends ouer-sea Sir William Poynings Knight, and Sir William Warham his Ambassadors to the Arch-Duke Philip Duke of Burgundy (then gouerned by others by reason of his tender age) who promised not to assist the said Perkin, but if the Dutchesse Dowager would doe any such thing, to the preiudice of King Henry, it was not in him to hinder her, for that she might dispose of her owne. A maine argument vsed by these Ambassadors before the Arch-Dukes Counsell to conuince, that Richard the very Duke of Yorke was murthered as well as King Edward his Brother German, as Polydor (who seemes to haue had good meanes to vnderstand these times) rehearseth it, was, That their Vncle Richard should in vaine haue made away the elder Brother, if the younger had beene suffered to suruiue, for that the right of the elder, was immediately vpon his death in the younger, and that consequently during his life, King Richard could haue no more assurance, then if the elder were still aliue: which Argument notwithstanding doth at most proue nothing but this: That their Vncle the Vsurper might intend, that both his Nephewes should be murthered, and that hee knew nothing perhaps to the contrary. Whereas facts are to be proued by confessions of parties, by witnesses, or vehement presumptions, (though vehement presumptions are said to constitute but an halfe proofe) all which are *otherwhere so supplyed, as leaues small cause to doubt of both their deaths. But Warham (a learned Priest and Doctor in the Lawes) the mouth of that Ambassage sent to the Arch-Duke, in the end of his oration vsed this bitter scoffe and Sarcasme against the Lady Margaret: *That she in her olde age brought forth two Monsters within the space of a few yeeres, and both of them not in the eight, or ninth moneth after their conception, as naturall mothers, but in the one hundred and eightieth moneth; and whereas other women brought forth Infants vtterly vnable to helpe themselues, these births of hers were tall striplings, and as soone as they were borne, offered battell vnto mighty Kings. And albeit the Arch-Dukes answere seemed reasonable, yet was not King Henry so satisfied, but that within a while after, for * that the Arch-Duke had secretly furnisht Perkin with leaders, he tooke occasion to banish all Flemings, and Flemish wares out of his Dominions, and inhibited his Subiects to trade in any Countries within the obedience of Maximilian King of Romans, or of the Arch-Duke Philip his Sonne, who by way of talio and requitall did the like against the English.

(37) Let vs come now from the addresses of things, to their doing. The high prudence and industry of Henry hauing thus discouered the foundations of Perkins hopes in England, and the humors which were most vnsound, made it his first worke to raze those ground-workes, and purge the vaines of his Realme from that corruption by needfull Phlebotomy. The * Lord Fitzwalter, a principall conspirator, being condemned, and sent to Callis, liued there in hope of pardon; but for practising with his Keepers to escape, he finally payed his head for satisfaction. Sir Simon Montfort, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney (Gentlemen of Noble houses) as Captaines and Authors of the Conspiracy, were beheaded, but all the rest, aswel Clerks as Lay-men, had their pardons. Not long after these executions and pardons, the King vpon sure intelligence that Sir Robert Clifford (in whose bosome the secret of all Perkins plot lay) was arriued, entred the Tower of London, and there continued; that so, if Clifford should accuse any of the great, (and whom hee then would accuse, it is probable King Henry knew) they might without suspition, or tumult, be attached; the Court, and publique prison for crimes of highest nature, being then within the cincture of one and the same wall. Sir Robert Clifford at his comming into the Kings presence, (though he was secretly before assured of his life) most humbly praying and obtaining pardon, appeached (among many others) Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine. The King would not at first giue credite (or at least-wise pretended not to giue credite) to the accusation of a Peere so great, and so neere vnto him: but vpon farther search, finding the same confirmed with circumstances, and particularly, for that he said to Clifford, * He would neuer beare Armes against the yong man, if hee knew him for certaine to be the Sonne of King Edward, he resolueth to vse seuerity against the delinquent.

(38) But Bernard Andreas directly saith, That (besides bare words and purposes) Sir William had supported Perkins cause with treasure, wherein he is recorded so to haue abounded, as that in his Castle of * Holt he had in coine and plate to the value of forty thousand Markes, besides Lands of inheritance in sundry places about, to the yearely value of three thousand pounds (a pretty stocke in treasure at those times, to vphold the first brunt of a Warre, and a large extent of Land to furnish the wing of a powerfull Battell, with able Souldiers out of Tenancies) with all which the same Author in plaine wordes, saith, That he promised to defend the said Pretender, and bring him into the Kingdome. And if we haue any in-sight into King Henries disposition, it seemes to vs, that before he entred into the Tower, he not only knew the Lord Chamberlaine vn-sound, but also that for his quiet apprehension hee chiefly repaired thither. Stanley being hereupon attached, and referred to farther examination, is said, * To haue denied nothing of all that wherewith he was charged, which hee perhaps the more confidently did, in hope that King Henry would pardon him, in respect of passed seruices, they (in their effects considered) being the greatest whereof mortality is capable, preseruation of life, and gayning of a Kingdome: But the poore Gentleman found himselfe farre deceiued in his politicke Lord and Master, who (to teach mankinde thereby, how dangerous it is to make a King) was not vnwilling to cut him off, as perswading himselfe, that those seruices proceeded of ambition, not of affection, or if of affection, the cause now ceasing, the contrary effects might proue as pernicious, as the other had beene aduantageous and auaileable. The King was vnwilling to displease his Father-in-Law, Thomas Earle of Derby (Brother-German to Sir William Stanley) and did therefore for a while suspend his iudgement; but rigour finally preuailed, hee was at Westminster openly arraigned, conuicted, and afterward ward at the block on Tower-hill beheaded. In whose office Giles Lord Dawbeny a most faithfull and moderate man succeeded. This sharpe iustice exercised vpon so eminent a person, was of great vse in the stay of peoples minds through the Realme of England. But in Ireland they were not so setled, or reduced, but that for the better and fuller purging thereof, Henry Deny (a Monke of Langton Abbey) was sent Lord Chancellour thither, with orders and directions, and Sir Edward Poynings Knight, with Souldiers; whose greatest diligence and cares were not wanting, to punish such as heretofore had aided Perkin, or might hereafter. The Earle of Kildare Lord Deputie, falling into suspition with Poynings, was by him apprehended, and sent prisoner into England; where the King did not onely graciously heare and admit his defences, but also returned him with honour, and continuation of authority. In the meane time (the errour, or weakenesse of the Burgundian Dutchesse and her Perkin, suffering their enemy in this sort, to puruey for his owne sucurity, and their depulsion) and King Henry for farther assurance of himselfe makes a progresse into Lancashire, there to recreate with his Father in law the Earle, and the Countesse his Mother, where among all other his secret purposes, he throughly satisfied the Earle, both for the iustice and necessity of Sir William Stanleyes death.

(39) These certainely, were perillous times to liue in, and vndoubtedly full of infinite iealousies, and hypocrisies, nor vnlike to those lately passed, * Wherein there was nothing so plaine, and openly proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly in suspect, as many wel-counterfeited iewels make the true suspected: These generall distrusts being among the strange gradations, by which the incomprehensible prouidence doth vse to chastise insolent Nations, and to make regular Princes meere and absolute. But the Dutchesse and her Perkin knowing all things as they passed in England, resolue notwithstanding to proceede; and therefore taking aduantage of the Kings absence in the North, hee with a force of a broken and discontented persons, sets saile for England, and approcheth the coasts of Kent about Sandwich and Deale, there to beginne his enterprize for obtaining the Crowne of England, vnder the borrowed name and title of Richard Duke of Yorke, if he found the Commons forward. But they, though doubtfull at first what to doe, yet at the last considering that his Souldiers were for the most part of desperate fortunes, and felonious quality, (though hardy otherwise, and approued men of warre,) remembring withall the mischiefes of part-takings, would not adhere, but trayning them within danger vpon promise of succour, and assaile, driue them to their shippes, take fiue of their Captaines, Montford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quintin, and Genin, and * one hundreth, sixty foure others, which were all of them afterward executed. Perkin himselfe who would not trust his person on shore, being worthily troubled at the in-auspicious fortune of his followers, presently hoised sailes, and returned to his Lady Patroneſſe and Creatrix, into Flanders.

(40) These newes being brought to the King, where he was then in the North, he is * said to haue giuen God thankes, and declared his ioy in these words: I am not ignorant (most mercifull Iesu) how great victories thou hast giuen mee, vpon the Saturday, at the prayers of thy most gracious Mother, all which I ascribe not to my deserts, but to the bounty of thy celestiall grace. Thou seest, ô most benigne Iesu, how many snares, how many deceits, how many weapons, that terrible Iuno hath prepared, notwithstanding that after my marriage, she faining her selfe ioyfull, hath faithfully promised to beare toward vs all fauour and good-will, but shee, more changeable then the winde, peruerting all things, aswell diuine as humane, feares not God, but in her fury seekes the vtter ruine of her owne bloud. Thou, ô God, who knowest all, deliuer vs also (if wee seeme worthy) from these euils, but if our sinnes haue deserued to suffer, doe thou, ô Lord, thy good pleasure. Neuertheless, we owe to thy Grace immortall thankes, which though with our tongue we cannot vtter worthily enough, yet must they be rendred. We are alwaies of good courage, and so minded for certaine, that no prosperity, no aduersity, no chance, no distance of places, or times, shall once make vs of thee vnmindfull. The most modest King hauing ended his speech, doth forth-with (saith our Author) seriously deliberate with his Councell what was to be done hereafter. It may probably seeme, that he had with-drawne into the North, to inuite Perkin (by occasion of his absence) the rather to take Land, that so he might draw all his dangers into one place, and decide them in a Battell, if his Subiects should reuolt to Perkin in any numbers, or if they did not, then might he fall into his hands, by landing vnwarily vpon trust of the peoples fauour, and so by a more compendious and easie way settle his Estate; of which he failed but little, by the said counter-policy of the Kentishmen. In regard whereof, in the first Act of Councell, praise and thankes were decreed to them, with which first Sir Richard Gilford Knight was presently sent away, and order taken for the erection and watching of Beacons vpon the Coasts.

(41) The Dutchesse on the other side, seeing the South of England proue so drie, and barren to her drifts, conueighes againe her Idoll into Ireland, where shee well knew there could not want partakers; and Perkin himselfe daring to entertaine the hope of a Crowne, (for by so long personation of a Kings Sonne, and heire, ambition had throughly kindled his youthfull bloud) was now no little cause of bringing things to an issue by his owne forwardnesse. * Maximilian King of Romans, whither as one willing to keepe the English busied (* Henry hauing forbidden his Subiects all traffique with the Flemmings, and all other of his Sonne the Arch-Dukes Subiects,) or as crediting the fiction, and therefore led thereunto in honour and conscience; * Charles also King of France, but specially the Dutchesse of Burgundy, (by whom this bubble was first blowne vp, and put abroad) did concurre to the molestation of King Henry; Maximilian, and the French King, more secretly, but the Dutchesse with all her Oares and Sailes plied it in open view. Boren vp by these supporters, he the rather easily drew the Irish to assent to his pretext; but his counsell weighing with themselues that the Irish-mens friendship, how firme so euer, was insufficient in respect of their nakednesse and pouerty to worke their wishes, hee according to such aduises as were taken before his departure from his Creatrix, crosseth into Scotland, for feare of punishment, saith * Andreas; if perhaps by the Kings true Subiects within Ireland he should chaunce to be apprehended; but the euent shewes, that it was not onely for his more security, but principally to strengthen his enterprize with the Scottish aide, whereof in those dayes he had small reason to be doubtfull; and his case was such, that no third course was left vnto him, but either to fight and conquer, or liue branded with immortall infamy both of Cowardize and impostur. Henry hearing these things, was not slacke to prouide for his iust defence, greatly carefull vpon what coast this wandering cloud would at length dissolue it selfe, in what effects soeuer; and therefore obserued all his wayes with as much curiosity as was possible.

(42) Iames the fourth, a yong Prince of great hope, was at that time King of Scots, to whom this bold counterfeit (being specially recommended for the true Richard Duke of Yorke, by the * King of France, and vndoubtedly much more by the Dutchesse of Burgundy,) repaires; and had most courteous entertainement, and audience, the effect whereof Andreas thus coucheth: That the King was finally deceiued by errour, as most of other, though most prudent Princes, had beene before. But the rare impudency of the the Lad, and that connexion which his darings had with ſo many great Princes, deſerue not to be ſo ſlenderly ouerpaſſed. He therefore being in honourable manner accompanied, and brought to the preſence of K. Iames, had words to this effect. That Edward the fourth, late King of England, leauing two ſonnes Edward and Richard Duke of Yorke, both very young, Edward the eldeſt ſucceeded their Father in the Crowne, by the name of King Edward the fift: that their Vncle Richard Duke of Glouceſter to obtaine the Kingdome, purpoſed to murther both, but the inſtrument employed by him to execute the execrable Tragedy, hauing cruelly ſlaine King Edward the eldeſt of the two, was moued to ſaue King Richard his Brother, whom neuertheles the world ſuppoſed to haue been alike barbarouſly made away; though falſely ſuppoſed; for that himſelfe there preſent, was that very Richard Duke of Yorke, brother of that vnfortunate Prince, King Edward the fift, now the moſt rightfull, and lineall ſuruiuing heire-Male to that victorious and moſt noble Edward of that name the fourth, late King of England. * That hee in his tender age thus eſcaping by Gods mercy out of the County of London, was ſecretly conuayed ouer the Sea, * whither when he was brought, the party who had the conueiance of him in charge, ſuddenly forſooke him, and thereby forced him to wander into * diuers Countries, where hee remained certaine yeeres as vnknowne, * till at length he came to the true vnderſtanding of himſelfe. * In which ſeaſon it hapned one Henry, ſonne to Edmund Tydder Earle of Richmond, to come from France, and enter into the Realme, and by ſubtill and fowle meanes, to obtaine the Crowne of the ſame, which to him the ſaid Richard rightfully appertained. That Henry as his extreame and mortall enemy, ſo ſoone as he had knowledge of his being aliue, imagined, and wrought all the ſubtill waies and meanes hee could, to deuiſe his finall deſtruction. That the ſaid mortall enemy hath not onlie falſely ſurmiſed him to be a fained perſon, giuing him nick-names, ſo abuſing the world, but that alſo, to deferre, and put him from entrie into England, hee hath offered large ſummes of money to corrupt the Princes, with whom he had beene retained, and made importune labour to certaine ſeruants about his (the ſaid Richards) perſon, to murder or poiſon him, and others, to forſake and leaue his righteous quarrell, and to depart from his ſeruice, as Sir Robert Clifford, and others. That euery man of reaſon may well vnderſtand, that the ſaid Henry needed not to haue moued the fore-ſaid Coſts, and importune labour, if he had beene ſuch a fained perſon. That the truth of his cauſe ſo manifeſt * moued the moſt Chriſtian King Charles, and the Lady, Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundy, his moſt deare Aunt, not onely to acknowledge the ſaid truth, but louingly alſo to aſſiſt him. That now becauſe the Kings of Scotland (Predeceſſors of the ſaid King Iames) had oftentimes ſupported them, who were reft and ſpoyled of the ſaid Kingdome of England, (as in freſheſt memory King Henry the ſixt,) and for that he (the ſaid King Iames) had giuen cleare ſignes, that hee was in no noble quality, vnlike to his royall Anceſtors, he, ſo diſtreſſed a Prince, was therefore moued to come, and put himſelfe into his hands, deſiring his aſſiſtance to recouer the Realme of England, promiſing faithfully, to beare himſelfe towards the ſaid Scottiſh King, no otherwiſe, then as if he had been his own naturall brother, and would (vpon recouery of his inheritance) gratefully do to him all the pleaſure which lay in his vtmoſt power.

(43) Perkins ſpeech ended, and his amiable perſon being fitted with ſo many countenancing circumſtances of ſtate, and ſeemings, (by the recommendations of great Princes, ayde from the Iriſh, aſſured hope of ayde in England, and his owne well-appointed company,) made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion in the young Kings conceit, that, albeit there wanted not ſome, who with * many arguments aduiſed the King to repute all but for a meere dreame, and illuſion, his perſon was honourably receiued, as it became the perſon of Richard Duke of Yorke, and in his quarrell entertained; which the more to grace in the Worlds eye, hee gaue his conſent, that the ſaid Duke of Yorke ſhould take to wife the Lady Katherine Gordon, daughter to the Earle of Huntley, being neere Coſen to the King himſelfe, a young Maide of excellent beauty and vertue. By which marriage, as the gentle King abundantly declared, that he tooke him for the very Duke of Yorke, ſo Perkin, (diſtruſtfull of the Scots, * and deſirous to gaine the loue and fauour of the Nobles of the Realme) cunningly ſerued his owne ends for the preſent, paſſing current for a Prince of high bloud, and royall hope. Vpon this ground a warre was preſently vndertaken againſt Henry, and entred into; the King of Scots in perſon, and Perkin followed with great numbers, ſpecially of Borderers, fell vpon ſundry parts of Northumberland, which they moſt grieuouſly afflicted, burnt and ſpoyled, publiſhing neuertheleſſe by Proclamation made in the name of Richard Duke of Yorke, much fauour and immunity to all ſuch as would adhere to his iuſt quarrell, and a * thouſand pounds in money, and one hundreth Markes by yeare of Land of inheritance to the meaneſt perſon, that could either take or diſtreſſe his great enemy who (he ſaid) was flying the land. But King Henry by his diligence, and wiſdome had ſo ſetled the mindes of his people in thoſe parts, that there is no mention made of any one perſon which offered his ſeruice. This vnexpected auerſion ſo blankt and dampt the Scottiſh enterprize on Perkins behalfe, that the King offended therewith, retired with his Army (laden with booty) into his Realme, and from thenceforth eſteemed of his new Coſen the leſſe. But King Henry not minding to forgiue ſo vniuſt and cauſeleſſe out-rages, calls a Parliament, opens his griefes, and prayes ayde for an inuaſiue warre gainſt Scotland, which was generally aſſented vnto, there being ſcarce any more gratefull propoſitions to the Engliſh in thoſe ſwording times, then warre with French or Scots: an humour, vpon which this King did practiſe to enrich himſelfe. For the publike monies by theſe occaſions came into his Exchequer, with a ſmall part whereof he flouriſhed out a ſhow of hoſtile prouiſions, and the Remainder thervpon (if peace enſued, which he alwayes knew how to bring about with honour) was clearely his owne without account. The ſumme aſſented to be gathered was * ſixeſcore thouſand pounds, and for collection thereof were granted two diſmes, and an halfe, and two fifteenes. But the leuie of this money ſo granted in this Parliament, kindled a dangerous blaze in England; in ſo much, that the Lord Dawbeny being ſent Generall of the Forces againſt the Scots, and vpon his way thither, was recalled by occaſion of inteſtine troubles.

(44) Which troubles had their Originall from the leuie of ſuch payments among the Corniſh, as were aſſeſſed for the Scottiſh warres. When therefore the Collectors came among them, the People (being a ſtout, bigge, and hardy race of men,) tumultuouſly aſſembled; whom one Thomas * Flammocke a Lawyer, and Michael Ioſeph, a Blacke-ſmith or Horſe-Farrier of Bodnim, like firebrands of rebellion, inflamed, and were followed as Captaines, not without ſecret and ſilent relation (as it may bee ſuſpected) to Perkins pretences, and that hope of redreſſe (if he were King), which, by his Proclamations he had colourably giuen to the people, at the time of the Scottiſh Inuaſion; where, among many other things, (tending to humour ſuch as were maleuolent, by making the perſon and gouernment of King Henry odious,) this we finde.

(45) Our great enemy (ſaith the Proclamation) to fortifie his falſe quarrell, hath cauſed diuers Nobles of this our Realme, whom he held ſuſpect, & ſtood in dread of, to be cruelly murdered: as our coſen Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Simond Montford, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, William Daubeney, Humfrey Stafford,

Alſo he hath long kept, and yet keepeth in priſon our right intirely wel-beloued Coſen, Edward, ſonne and heire to our Vncle Duke of Clarence, and other, with-holding from them their rightfull inheritance, to the intent they ſhould neuer be of might and power, to aide and aſſiſt vs at our need, after the dutie of their leageances. He hath alſo married, by compulſion, certaine of our Siſters, and alſo the Siſter of our foreſaid Coſen, the Earle of Warwick, and diuers other Ladies of the blood-Royall, vnto certaine his kinſemen and friends, of ſimple and low degree; & putting apart all well-diſpoſed Nobles, he hath none in fauour, and truſt about his perſon, but Biſhop Fox, Smith, Bray, Louel, Oliuer King, Sir Charles Sommerſet, Dauy Owen, Ryſſy, Sir Iohn Torburuile, Tyler, Chamley, Iames Hobert, Iohn Cut, Garth, Henry Wyot, and ſuch other Caitiues, and villaines of birth: which by ſubtill inuen-

(46) The tide of people being thus vp: Flammock and the Blacke-Smith (hauing firme promiſe of the Lord Audleys perſonal helpe) lead them forth toward Kent, where they doubted not greatly to encreaſe their numbers; and had in likelyhood ſo done, but that the ſingular diligence and wiſdome of the King, fruſtrated their hopes by ſundry Princely Acts. Yet they flow on; and to ſhew what they durſt doe, they ſlew in their way at Tauntford, the Prouoſt of Perin, one of the Commiſſioners for the Subſidy; and marching forward, without offering other violence, Iames Tuichet Lord Audley ioynes himſelfe at the City of Wells vnto them, according to ſecret agreement, and becomes their Generall. From Wells they proceed to Saliſbury, thence to Wincheſter, and ſo toward Kent, where the Countrey was ſetled and prouided. But the King farther doubting that the Scots would take freſh occaſion, by theſe ſeditious vproares, to inuade the borders of his Realme, diſpatched Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey (* a Peere of excellent vertue) to defend thoſe parts, with the helpe of the Biſhopricke of Durham, and the Marches, till theſe home-commotions were appeaſed; that then the Lord Dawbeny might with a iuſt and full Army proſecute the warre againſt the Scots. But Iames their King, perceiuing the end of the Engliſh inteſtine warres, would be the beginning of his troubles, thought it beſt by way of anticipation to weaken his enemy before hand as much as he could, and thereupon fiercely inuaded Northumberland againe, and * beſieged Norham Caſtell belonging to Richard Fox, whom the King for his noble ſeruices and deſerts, had now aduanced from Exceſter, & Bathe and Wells, vnto the Biſhopricke of Durham. But the Scottiſh king, hopeleſſe to winne the Caſtell, though hauing done much hurt both to it and to the Countrey, withdrew his people before the Earle of Surrey could approach with his Army, wherein was the Earle of Weſtmorland, the Lords, Dacres, Strange, Neuill, Latimer, Lumley, Scrope, Clifford, Conyers, Darcy, the Baron of Hilton, and many Knights, as Percie, Bulmer, Gaſgoigne, Penington, Bigot, Bowes, Elarker, Parr, Wharton, Strangwith, Conſtable, Ratcliffe, Sauile, Gower, Muſgraue, Mallerie, Loder, Eueringham, Stapleton, Wortley, Pikering, Hiron, Gray, Ridley, Griffith, Fenwicke, Ward, Strycland, Billingham, Curwen, Warcop, Tempeſt, Metcalfe, and others; who miſſing the enemy, marched after into Scotland, and tooke ſuch reuenge as the ſhortneſſe of their ſodaine prouiſions would enable.

(47) The Rebels on the other ſide, (whom King Henry thought not good to encounter in their firſt heates; but ſuffered them to tyre their furie, and ſurbate themſelues with a long march, the Countries as they paſt being fore-layd from ioyning with them) comming neere to Kent, found few, or no partakers there; but the Countrey ſtrongly defended againſt them by the Earle thereof, the Lords Aburgeny and Cobham, with other principall men and their followers; which made diuers of the Rebels ſecretly ſhrinke and abandon the enterpriſe. But the Lord Audley, Flammocke, Michael Ioſeph, and the reſt, kept on their way, and encamped vpon Blacke-heath, between Greenewich and Eltham, from the top whereof they might behold the City of London, and the whole brauery of that Horizon. Here they reſolue to abide the King, or to aſſaile London. The King on the other ſide, by the diligence of the Lord Mayor, and other the Magiſtrates, ſecured the City, which was full of feare and buſineſſe; himſelfe enuironed with his Nobles, and the choyſe of the South, hearing where the Rebell was encamped, reſolued by dint of Sword to deliuer his people from tyring expectations, and for that purpoſe marcheth out of London, and encamps in S. Georges field, where hee * lay that night. The next day, when hee vnderſtood that the Enemy had drawne forth his people, and ſet them in battell-ray, he ſends out Henry Bourchier Earle of Eſſex, Edmond de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and others, with certaine Cornets of Horſe, and Companies of Archers, to beſet the hill, and the deſcents thereof, while Giles Lord Dawbeny with the ſtrength of his Army, chargeth the Enemy in Front, whom with ſome ſlaughter they draue from the Bridge at Deepford ſtrand; and then mounting the hill, hee & the Earles charge the maine ſquadrons on all ſides, and without much labour breake and defeate them. The number of the Rebels ſlaine is vncertainely reported, the ods being betweene * two thouſand and * three hundreth. The Kings army returned fewer by three hundreth. Fifteene hundreth rebels were taken Priſoners, & the takers had their Priſoners goods granted them. Iames Lord Audley, Flammocke, and the Smith were taken, and executed. To all the reſt mercy was ſeaſonably extended. The Lord Audley led from Newgate to Tower-hill in a Coate of his owne Armories painted on a paper, reuerſt and torne, there payd his head, for being a Head to that heady Route: Flammocke and the Smith were quartered. Memorably * ſtrange was the comfort, with which this Blackſmith is ſaid to haue cheered vp himſelfe at his being drawne to execution, ſaying, That yet he hoped thereby, that his Name & Memory ſhould be euerlaſting. Who could beleeue that the deſire of a long-laſting name, howſoeuer, ſhould take the affections of ſo meane a perſon? Such therefore was the end of this inſurrection; but the times being queaſie, the King wiſely forbare to take any ſeuere reuenge vpon more then onely vpon the chiefe Leaders, for hee was truely informed that this calamity had not broken the wills of the Corniſhmen, who remained ready ready for any desperate sudden occasion, and therefore he abstained from needlesse exasperations, insomuch as that the quarters of Flammocke, and the Smith being once appointed to haue beene set vp in Cornwall for terror, were onely fixed about London, the King thinking good to temper his iustice euen in such a circumstance.

(48) His next care was so to order the warre against Scotland, that the Peace, whose foundations he had laid a farre off, might be made to his more honor: and because the iniuries sustained by the youthfull errour of King Iames, were too publike to be altogether forgotten; hee sent the Earle of Surrey, the Lord Neuill, and others, to inuade the Scottish borders with an Army, who pursued the reuenge with great vehemency. Meane-while there arriueth in Scotland Peter Hyalus an Ambassadour from Ferdinando and Elizabeth, King and Queene of Spaine, as from friends equally well-affected to both parties, to mediate a peace betweene the two Kings of England and Scotland, which perhaps in their owne persons would not easily haue beene brought about, the poynt of honour might thereunto haue giuen such empeachment. But this was the way to a peace which King Henry fore-saw, there being not onely a strict bond of loue betweene him and Ferdinando, but an ouerture, if not a * secret conclusion, to match his eldest Sonne Prince Arthur with the young Lady Katherine daughter of Spaine, who for her excellent vertues was well worthy to be the happy wife of any Prince then breathing. Hyalus so handled the poynt of his employment, that an honourable truce followed. This Ambassadour was a practicke man, of much experience, and knew the better how to deale on the behalfe of King Henry against Perkin Warbecke (* an imaginary and Stage-play Prince) for that his Soueraigne Queene had also beene exceedingly molested by a Counterfeit. For Henry the fourth, King of Castile, and brother to Elizabeth, being vnable to beget Children, Ioan (Daughter of Edward King of Portugall) his wife found meanes notwithstanding to beare one, by occasion whereof, after King Henries death, for that it was borne in marriage, a dangerous warre was vndertaken by * Alfonso King of Portugall, on behalfe of Isabel the supposed inheritrix; but Truth, partly by force, and partly by mediation, was in the end victorious; and Elizabeth, or Isabella sister of Henry succeeded to her brother, and brought the inheritance of the Kingdomes of Castile and Leon, with her to Ferdinando King of Arragon. The chiefe point of this truce with Scotland was, That Perkin Warbecke should leaue that Kingdome, seeing King Iames, standing vpon his honour, would not deliuer him vp to King Henry. Perkin hauing now no remedy, did accordingly, taking with him his Wife, the Lady Katherine Gordon; and with such few as remained to him, past into Ireland, where hee had not continued long, but the Cornish-men offer to rise at his arriuall, and to aduenture their fortunes and liues in his quarrell: Which motion Perkin gladly entertained, as perceiuing yet some little hope left to maintaine himselfe, by the troubles and hazards of others: but the pollicy and fortune of King Henry were growne so venerable with the Princes his Neighbours, that Ambassadors came from Fraunce, and from the Arch-Duke of Burgundy; the one to ratifie amity, the other to request the restitution thereof; both which K. Henry (who reposed his whole trust next vnder God, vpon the amity of his neighbours) granted, and the English Merchants (who had beene somewhat long forbidden by their Soueraigne to trade in the Arch-Dukes Dominions) * returning to Antwerpe were receiued into the same with Procession: so that Perkin could scarce cast his eye vpon any place, not onely where to raise aydes, but not where to rest his head, vnlesse perhappes in the Court of the Dutchesse of Burgundy; neither in all his fortunes did any thing seeme miserable or vnworthy, but the great infelicity of his Wife, whose beauty, birth, and honourable qualities ought not to haue beene so betrayed by her friends temerity. Perkin hereupon landing at Whitsand Bay in Cornwall in September, found meanes afterward at Bodmin to raise some thousands of people, whom with most lauish promises, inuectiue proclamations, and strong impudency, hee held together vnder the Title of Richard the fourth King of England, whose fate was none of the happiest, while the maiesty of her name might so bee played with by impostors. Perkin thus accompanied, marcheth toward the City of Excester, purposing if hee could winne it by force, to enrich his Souldiers with the spoyles thereof, and to inuite all other loose or lost people to his seruice by the hope of like booties, and by taking into his possession such places of strength as lay in his way to secure his retreat, if (according to the ordinary fortune of warre) any thing should happen to him vnluckily.

(50) But the King (hearing that the Varlet was landed, and againe made head against him in Armes vpon trust of the Cornish-mens assistance) is said to "haue smiled, vsing these words; * Loe, we are again "prouoked by this Prince of Rakehells, but left my peo-"ple should through ignorance be drawne into destru-"ction, let vs seeke to take this Perkin by the easiest "wayes we can. Reason he had to smile, for now hee seemed to see the bottome of his perill, and as it were to hold his enemy empounded within the English Ocean, it being a perpetuall and noble wish of his, that he might looke his dangers in the face, and deale with them hand to hand, as the neerest cut ouer to a full conclusion. He therefore prouides accordingly, assembling his forces, and his wits (no lesse to bee dreaded then his forces) sending forth his espyals into all parts to obserue the tracke, and hopes of this empty cloud, which is now seene before Excester, a principall strength and ornament of the Westerne parts of the Kingdome. Parlea, and the allurements of words vnder the guilt title of King Edwards Sonne, prouing vnpaileable with those resolute and faithfull Citizens; Perkin forthwith betakes himselfe to violence, sets fire on the gates, mounts his scaling Ladders against the walls, and with his vtmost fury labours to force a suddaine entrance, for that as hee suspected, succours could not long bee wanting. The Citizens on the other side, and such of the Country as came in, prepare, and make a very valiant defence against the Rebell, & in stead of quenching the fires kindled by the enemy at the gates, to open a passage (for they had not Canon, or any other Ordinance) the Citizens threw on great store of fagots and fuell, and so with flame did shut vp the way, when the gates themselues were now consumed; and in the meane-while they cast vp trenches, and man their walls, from whence, with the slaughter of about two hundred Rebels at this assault, they valiantly draue them. Such messengers as by cords slipt downe the walls, to signifie their perill, sped toward the King; but the loyall diligence of * Edward Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, the Lord William his Sonne, with many principall Gentlemen of those parts, as Trenchard, Carew, Fulford, Halewell, Croker, Edgecombe, Semar, followed with great store of Souldiers, saued him the labour of a personall rescue by timely approach.

(51) Perkin hearing thereof, riseth from before Excester, and marcheth to Taunton (a goodly towne not farre off) there to take the musters of his Army, and to prouide for encounter, where he found very many blanks in the list of his numbers, for that they had secretly shrunke away, as misdoubting the sequell, the Earle of Deuonshire being so neere at hand with the power of the Country, and the King vpon his way against them, with the maiesty and terrour of a royall name and Army, none of the Nobility (which was chiefly hoped) comming to their aide.

Perkin at Taunton.

Perkin neuertheleſſe makes ſhew of ſtanding, with ſuch as were left vnto him. The Earle of Deuonſhire marching towards Taunton, in the way there came vnto him Edward Duke of Buckingham, a * young Lord, full of great honour and courage, followed by a goodly troupe of Knights, and others excellently well appointed, both for their own perſons, and their peoples. Theſe we finde named as principall; Bridges, Bainham, Barkley, Tame, Wiſe, Poyntz, Vernon, Mortimer, Tremail, Sutton, Paulet, Bricknell, Sapcott, Lutterell, Wadham, Specke, Beauchamp, Cheney, Tokett, Long, Latimer, Turberuile, Stourton, Newbrough, Martin, Lynde, Rogers, Hungerford, Semar, Darrell, Barow, Norres, Langford, Corbet, Blunt, Lacon, Cornwall; and many other prime and valiant men of Armes. The King laſt of all (to permit as little to fortune as was poſſible) ſent Robert Lord Brooke, Giles Lord Dawbeney, and that renowned and truſty Welſhman Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the marrow and ſtrength of his Army before, himſelfe following in perſon with ſuch as hee thought good. Neither was his care cauſeleſſe, for the Corniſhmen were come to that height of deſperate obſtinancy and malice, * as not one of them but reſolued to conquer, or to leaue his carkaſe in the place. But God loued him and them better, then to ſuffer it to come ſo farre; for Perkin, whether fearing treaſon in his owne Army, or otherwiſe toucht with the conſcience of his quality, and damnable eſtate of the quarrell, wherin it was horrible to die, hauing in his troupe but threeſcore horſe, ſecretly fled from the ſeduced Commons. Which when the King heard, hee preſently ſets out fiue hundreth horſe to purſue and apprehend him, before he ſhould get to the Sea, and ſo eſcape. Perkin and his remaines thus ſtreightned, tooke Sanctuary at Beaulieu, a religious houſe within New Forreſt, (not farre from Hampton) where the Kings Cornets of horſe found them already regiſtred; but according to inſtructions they beſet the place, and maintaine a ſtrong watch about it day and night. The other Rebels the while without ſtroke ſtricken, humbled themſelues to their Soueraignes mercy, and found it in vndeſerued meaſure. Other ſtrong troupes of Horſe are at the ſame inſtant diſpatched to Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, where the beautifull Lady Katherine Gorden had beene left by her lewde Husband. Her without reſiſtance they brought ſafely to the King, whoſe beauty the whole Court praiſed, and pittied; but the King moſt gratiouſly comforting her, ſent her away well attended to the Queene his Wife, and for her birthis-ſake allowed her * maintenance, which in honourable manner ſupported her during the Kings life and many yeares after. Her faireneſſe was ſuch, and her preſence ſo amiable, that ſhee deſerued to bee commonly called The White Roſe; whoſe fortunes (being ſo farre vnworthy either of her birth, her ſingular modeſty, or Wiuely faith, notwithſtanding the ſo abiect condition of her Husband) as they moued iuſt commiſeration toward her, ſo they doubled the luſtre of her praiſes.

(52) In the mean-while the King makes a reioycefull entrance into Exceſter, to teſtifie his princely loue to the Citizens, whom hee highly commended and graced, both for their courage and loyalty; commanding ſome of the Corniſh Rebels to be executed there, which did the better ſet off the others contrary condition. There alſo hee gaue directions, to offer life, and obliuion of all crimes to Perkin, if he would voluntarily quit the Sancturay, and ſubmit himſelfe. Perkin being now without hope, without abode, without eſtate, moſt gladly came forth, and did put himſelfe into the Kings hands. Reaſons leading that wiſe Prince to extend this fauour, were drawne out of the depth of true iudgement, cleared from vulgar perturbations: firſt, it was not altogether impoſſible, but that Perkin might eſcape him, (though by offering ſelfe-violence) and ſo the world ſhould leeſe the light of ſatisfaction in ſo profound and perhaps a matchleſſe impoſture; then againe, his youth might merite ſome compaſſion; but the infinite deſire which Henry had, from the mouth of the party himſelfe, to learne all the ſecrets of the plot, and who they were that lay vndiſcouered, and yet had finger in the myſticall practiſe, moued him to affect the poſſeſſion of his perſon aliue; which now hee had. Thus was this ſo dreaded a blaze of Rebellion ſuddainely and finally quenched; but not without the teares of many in Deuon and Somerſetſhire, whoſe eſtates the Kings Officers ſcruzed and drained, in reuenge of their partaking, and ſupporting the Corniſh Rebels, either in the field, or flight. Henry hauing Perkin in his power, gaue way to all ſuch ſcornes and ſcoffes, which his Courtiers or others were pleaſed to paſſe vpon him, the more to make his perſon contemptible, who well-watched, followed the King to London, whither as he progreſſed, multitudes flockt about to behold the Caitife, * Who being a ſtranger, nor any way (whatſoeuer hee boaſted to the contrary) deſcended of Nobles, had dared to trouble ſo great a Kingdome, and by his crafty conuaiances had induced ſo many Princes and Nations (not without miſchiefe and ruine vnto diuers) to believe of him, that which he neuer was. And that he might in no part be vnknowne, he is leaſurely conuaied on horſebacke from the furtheſt part of * London, through Cheapſide and Cornehill to the Tower, and backe from thence through Canwicke-ſtreet to Weſtminſter, as the ſubiect of wonderment, and of all reproach and infamies. The King hauing in this ſort taken reuenge of his ſo ſtrange an enemy, and by curious and often examination comming to the full knowledge of that his ſoule deſired, did ſet ſuch to attend, as neuer went an inch from Perkins ſight, (though he ſeemed to goe at liberty) leſt through the ſlippery Arts of his tempting ſpeech and behauiour, he might vaniſh into forraigne parts, and raiſe freſh ſtormes in England, and bring new comfort to the Lady Margaret Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, the ſinnefull countenance of all this curſed Stratageme, whoſe heart was now almoſt riuen in ſunder with the newes of her Perkins moſt hideous ſhame and miſery; the whole bluſhing tenour whereof might eaſily come to her hands at once; for Henry cauſed ſo much of the principall matter, as Perkin had confeſſed, to bee * committed to the Printing Preſſe; (an Art then firſt appearing among vs,) and publiſhed. None can iuſtly wonder, that wee haue dwelt ſo long in this wonderfull Story, but rather perhaps wiſh that more particularities (though with more prolixity) had bin vſed. And though ſome other Actions as * Sebaſtian Cabots diſcouery, and ouertures of marriages with Spaine and Scotland, came betweene this apprehenſion, and the execution of Perkin, yet haue we thought it beſt, (the ſooner, and at once to rid our hands of a * knaue, as King Henry iuſtly called him) to couch all that which concernes him here together, not fearing to incurre among the learned, the taxation of committing therein contradiction, and confuſion of times.

(53) Perkin being thus guarded, doth notwithſtanding attempt to eſcape. And if it were lawfull to inſert particular coniectures, drawne out of the conſiderations of circumſtances, we ſhould perhaps not ſpare to ſay, that his attempt for eſcape, was not without the Kings priuity; vſing ſuch inſtruments to perſwade, or furniſh his flight, as might withall betray him, that ſo by degrees (occaſion taken to cut him off) the Realme might be ridde from ſuch perpetuall matter of trouble. For the depraued wit and will of man might finde or faine reaſons to abuſe the world ſtill, if Perkin were at liberty; as that the confeſſions were extorted by feare, or forged by Henry to ſerue his turne, and the like. Therefore Perkins intention and eſcape (for hee was eſcaped) being diſcouered to the King, all the wayes were beſet, and he ſo cloſe purſued, that in the end betaking himſelfe to a religious houſe of Carthuſian Monkes, hee declared who

(54) It is firſt to be knowne, that I was borne in the Towne of Tourney in Flanders, and my Fathers name is Iohn Osbecke, which ſaid Iohn Osbecke was controller of the ſaid Towne of Tourney, & my Mothers name is Katherine de Faro. And one of my Grandſires vpon my Fathers ſide was named Diricke Osbecke, which dyed. After whoſe death my Grandmother was married vnto Peter Flamin, that was receiuer of the fore-named Town of Tourney, & Deane of the Botemen, that row vpon the water or Riuer called Le Scheld. And my Grandſire vpon my Mothers ſide was Peter de Faro, which had in his keeping the keyes of the gate of Saint Iohns, within the ſame Towne of Tourney. Alſo I had an Vncle called Maſter Iohn Stalin, dwelling in the Pariſh of Saint Pias, within the ſame Towne, which had married my Fathers ſiſter, whoſe name was Ione or Iane, with-whom I dwelt a certaine ſeaſon.

Perkin maketh an anatomy of his deſcent or lineage.

(55) And after I was led by my Mother to Antwerpe for to learne Flemiſh, in a houſe of a Coſin of mine, an officer of the ſaid Towne, called Iohn Stienbecke, with-whom I was the ſpace of halfe a yeare; and after that I returned againe to Tourney, by reaſon of warres that were in Flanders: and within a yeare following, I was ſent with a Merchant of the ſaid Towne of Tourney named Berlo, to the Mart of Antwerpe, where I fell ſicke, which ſickneſſe continued vpon me fiue moneths. And the ſaid Berlo ſet mee to boord in a Skinners houſe, that dwelled beſide the houſe of the Engliſh Nation. And by him I was from thence carried to Barow Mart, and I lodged at the ſigne of the olde Man, where I abode for the ſpace of two moneths.

Perkins education or bringing vp.

(56) After this, the ſaid Berlo ſet me with a Merchant of Middleborow to ſeruice, for to learne the language, whoſe name was Iohn Strew, with-whom I dwelt from Chriſtmas to Eaſter, and then I went into Portugall in company of Sir Edward Bramptons Wife, in a ſhip was called the Queenes ſhippe. And when I was come thither, then was I put in ſeruice to a Knight that dwelled in Liſborne, which was called Peter Vacz de Cogna, with-whom I dwelled an whole yeare, which ſaid Knight had but one eye. And becauſe I deſired to ſee other Countries, I tooke licenſe of him, and then put my ſelfe in ſeruice with a Britaine, called Pregent Meno, which brought mee with him into Ireland. Now, when we were there arriued in the Towne of Corke, they of the Towne (becauſe I was arraied with ſome cloathes of ſilke of my ſaid Maſters) came vnto me, and threatned vpon me, that I ſhould be the Duke of Clarences ſon, that was before-time at Dublin.

Perkin a notable Land-loper.

The Iriſh would haue Perkin take vpon him to be the Duke of Clarences ſonne.

(57) But forſomuch as I denyed it, there was brought vnto mee the holy Euangeliſts, and the Croſſe, by the Mayor of the Towne, which was called Iohn Lewelin, and there in the preſence of him and others, I tooke mine oath (as the truth was) that I was not the fore-ſaid Dukes ſonne, nor none of his bloud. And after this came vnto mee an Engliſhman, whoſe name was Stephen Poitron, and one Iohn Water, and laid to me in ſwearing great oathes, that they knew well that I was King Richards Baſtard-Sonne; to whom I anſwered with like oathes, that I was not. Then they aduiſed mee not to be afeard, but that I ſhould take it vpon me boldly; and if I would ſo doe, they would ayde and aſſiſt me with all their power againſt the King of England; and not onely they, but they were well aſſured, that the Earle of Deſmond and Kildare would doe the ſame.

They beare Perkin downe with oathes, that hee is King Richards baſtard.

(58) For they forced not what part they tooke, ſo that they might bee reuenged on the King of England: and ſo againſt my will made me to learne Engliſh, and taught me what I ſhould doe and ſay: And after this they called me Duke of Yorke, ſecond Sonne to King Edward the fourth, becauſe King Richards Baſtard-ſonne was in the hands of the King of England. And vpon this the ſaid Water, Stephen Poitron, Iohn Tiler, Hubert Burgh, with many others, as the foreſaid Earles, entred into this falſe quarrell, and within ſhort time others. The French King ſent an Ambaſſadour into Ireland, whoſe name was Loit Lucas, and Maſter Stephen Friham, to aduertiſe mee to come into France: and thence I went into France, and from thence into Flanders, and from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and ſo into England.

They call him Duke of Yorke.

(59) From hauing thus beene made a publique ſpectacle, till all eyes were wearied with the view, and imaginations tyred with thinking; hee is conuaied to the Tower of London: where it had beene happy, if hee had onely wrought his owne deſtruction; but the bloudy fate (ſo to ſpeake of his diſaſterous birth) would not ſuffer him to periſh ſingle. In the ſame Tower was priſoner Edward the young Earle of Warwicke, hauing ſo beene from the firſt yeare of Henry to this preſent, for no fault of his, but for that, as a neere Titler to the Crowne, hee carried in his liuing perſon inſeparable matter of danger and ſedition. Of his ſimplicity, by reaſon of his education in priſon from his infancy, there is a report, that as one who liued out of the view of the world, hee knew not an * Henne from a Gooſe, or one Fowle or Creature from another. To haſten the ruine of ſo innocent a daunger, behold there breakes forth a counterfeit Earle of Warwicke, as if all that which the world ſaw horrible in Perkins darings, had been but a document to inſtruct others in the like, and that nothing were to be taxed therein, but want onely of ſucceſſe, which whoſoeuer could propound to himſelfe all things elſe, were full of encouragement and reaſon. This counterfeit was a * Cordwainers ſonne of London, aged about twenty yeares, and called * Ralfe Wilford, who for falſely aſſuming the name and title of the ſaid Earle, being thereunto taught & ſuborned (a practiſe which well declared that the malicious Dutcheſſe of Burgundy did ſtill liue) was hanged at S. Thomas Waterings by Southwarke vpon Shrouetueſday.

(60) This new deuiſe to vncrowne King Henry, ſo wakened his owne feares, and the eyes of the Caſtilians, (who had ſecretly agreed to marry their Princeſſe Katherine to our Prince Arthur) that there ſeemed no ſure ground of ſucceſſion, if that the Earle of Warwicke were not made away. A fearefull caſe, where the falſe reaſon of State ſhall faine to it ſelfe an impoſſibility of well doing, without ſhedding innocent bloud, and ſhall therefore reſolue to found vpon ſo crying a ſinne, the hope of perpetuity in ſucceſſion; ſith nothing is truer, then that ſinne was euer an vnſure baſis to ſettle laſting workes vpon. But ô the narrow capacities of the moſt ſeeing men! the confidence whereof did vndoubtedly leade this King (herein not iuſtifiable, howſoeuer excuſable in reſpect of humane frailty, which might propound to it ſelfe many feares, and reſpects both publique and priuate) to conniue at the plotted death, or rather formall murther of this harmeleſſe Gentleman, whoſe wrong may yet moue the hardieſt to compaſſion, as it afterward ſtirred

The true Earle of Warwicke deſigned to die.

God in iuſtice to reuenge, proſpering no part of that great worke which was thereupon thus corruptly ſought to be perpetuated. That noble Lady Katherine her ſelfe was hereof ſo ſenſible, that when the diuorce was afterward proſecuted againſt her by King Henrie the eight, her ſecond Husband, ſhe is reported to haue ſaid, That it was the hand of God, for that to cleare the way to her marriage, that innocent Earle of Warwicke was put to vnworthy death. Neither let licentious practiſes vouch the ſingular Act of Salomon in taking away the life of his elder Brother Adonias to colour this homicide: for hee that will argue from particular facts in Scripture, ſhall not onely leaue no Adonias liuing, but perhaps no Salomon. To worke this young Warwickes ruine, the miſchieuous and diſmall wretch Perkin becomes an occaſion, if not an inſtrument, for he by his ſupple inſinuations, and flowing promiſes, had corrupted his keepers, the ſeruants of Sir Iohn Digbie Knight, Lieutenant of the Tower; who (as * was affirmed) meant to haue murdered their Maſter, and then to haue ſet Perkin, and the Earle at large, to which practiſe of eſcape, the poore Earle is ſaid to haue conſented. Perkin for this conſpiracy had his tryall at Weſtminſter, and he, together with one Iohn à Waters, who had been ſometime Maior of Corke in Ireland, were condemned, and being drawne to Tyborne, had the ſentence of death executed vpon them. Perkin at the Gallowes did reade his former confeſſion, taking on his death that the ſame was true, and vnder-went his puniſhment with patience. Walter Blewet, and Thomas Aſtwood (being two of the Conſpirators, for the other two, Strangewaies and Long-Roger, being the Lieutenants men alſo, were not executed, nor for ſo much as we haue read, arraigned) not long after receiued the reward of their offence at the ſame place.

(61) Iuſtice thus tooke hold at laſt of Perkin Warbecke, on whom, the Prouerbe which ſaith, that Pride is the Vſher of ſhame, was worthily verified. Neither could the world accuſe King Henry for his death, vnleſſe it were, for that he had not hanged him ſooner, but ſuffered him to liue till he had drawne after him a greater ruine in Warwickes perſon, then in all the former Tragedies. For this Earle being a chiefe Prince of the bloud, and next heire-Male of his Houſe to the Crowne of England, (a crime of which his birth onely made him guilty and not any fact of his) being thus charged to haue giuen aſſent to Perkins plot of eſcape, he was publikely arraigned before the Earle of Oxford (then High Steward of England) by the name of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke, and indited for minding to haue eſcaped (as * they ſaid) out of the Tower, and conſequently (according to the dreadfull licenſe of inferences among our Engliſh pleaders in caſes of death) to depriue King Henry of his royall Crowne and dignity, and to vſurpe the Title and ſoueraigne office, proſecuting their bloudy Poetry with the like ſanguinary ſyllogiſmes, though vtterly without meaſure, or faſhion. The Earle doubly betrayed, firſt by the ſetters of the ſnare, and then by their ſilly or deceitfull perſwaſions who were put about him, confeſſeth the enditement, and ſubmitteth himſelfe to the Kings mercy; that is, offered vp his head to be a ſlippery foundation of King Henries farther purpoſes; for ſentence of death was thereupon pronounced as againſt a Traitour. This one practiſe ſeemes ſufficient, if not to caſt vpon Henry the Title of a ſhrewd and perillous man, yet to raiſe a doubt, whether (* as one writes) he was more ſincere and entire then Ferdinando King of Spaine, vpon whom (ſaith that Authour) hee did handſomely beſtowe the enuie of the death of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke. The life therefore of this Prince (according to rigour of law) being thus in his power, the King gently pardoned all the paines, but the loſſe of his head, which was cut off vpon a ſcaffold at Tower-hill, and then (another gracious fauour) his body was not buried in the Chappell of the Tower, or in any other common place, but at * Biſham by his Anceſtors. Icalous (ſaith * one) the King was ouer the greatneſſe of his Nobility, as remembring how himſelfe was ſet vp; and much more did this humour encreaſe in him after hee had conflicted with ſuch Idols and Counterfeits as Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbecke. The ſtrangeneſſe of which dangers made him thinke nothing ſafe. This Earle was the laſt heire-male of the bloud, and ſurname of Plantagenet; whoſe race, as it was a long time glorious for giuing Kings to England, (euen from King Henry the ſecond) ſo in the end (chiefly for the houſe of Yorke) it became hatefull (as it ſeemes) to God and man, for the moſt horrible and inextinguible deadly fewdes, murthers, periuries, and other horrors committed within it ſelfe, which (as then not fully expiated) lay heauily vpon the head of this Earle, and finally threw open all thoſe fences, which the poſſeſſion of Maieſty and numeroſity of iſſue had for ſundry ages caſt about it, letting in thereby the ſurname of Tydder, being but two deſcents Engliſh, and which now after three deſcents and fiue Princes is alſo vaniſhed. Now, among thoſe few great workes of peace which enſued their firebrands of warre, we muſt remember the marriage of Prince Arthur, with the Princeſſe of Spaine Lady Katherine: The interim from Warwicks death till then, brought forth a very great plague, whereof in London there are ſaid to haue dyed about thirty thouſand. The King and Queene remoue to Callis in May and returned in Iune. The maine * buſines was to reuiew and ratifie the ſtate of amity, and negociations, between the Engliſh and the Duke of Burgundies Subiects. Shine alſo was burnt, and being new builded, called Richmond, for which, and the like, it will be fitteſt to haue recourſe to vulgar Annals.

(63) The Lady Katherine being about eighteene yeares old, and borne of so great, so noble, so victorious and vertuous parents, is with iust majesty and solemnity openly * married in Pauls-Church to Arthur Prince of Wales, aged about fifteene yeares, and eldest sonne to Henry the seauenth, King of England, and of Elizabeth his wife. The Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted with nineteene Bishops and Abbots, mytred, joyned their hands, and performed all the other Church rites vpon that great day. The vulgar Annals can tell you the splendor and glorie thereof, in Apparrell, jewels, Pageants, Banquets, Guests, and other princely complements, the onely weighty businesse of many weaker braines. A graue Lady (as some haue written) was laid in bed between the Bride and Bride-groome, to hinder actuall consummation; in regard of the Princes greene estate of body; but others alleadge many arguments to proue that matrimoniall performance was betweene them, howsoeuer her selfe, (when that afterward came in question) * appealed to the conscience of King Henry the eight (her second husband) if he found her not a Maid. But Prince Arthur enjoyed his marriage a very short while, for in Aprill following he died at Ludlow, being vnder sixteene yeares of age: being a Prince, in whose youth the lights of all noble vertues did clearely begin to shine. His aptnesse to learne was almost incredible, for (by the report of his * Master) hee had eyther learned without booke, or otherwise studiously turned and reuolued with his owne hands and eyes these Authors following. (64) But before the vntimely expiration of this great hope of England, King Henry weary of warres and tumults; and desirous to lay the beginnings of a long peace by most inward friendship with all his great neighbours, had concluded a match betweene Margaret his eldest Daughter; and Iames the fourth King of Scotland, the * assurance whereof was published in the February next before Prince Arthurs death at Pauls-Crosse; in rejoycement whereof, Te Deum was sung, and other signes of publike joy declared. The * Bishop of Rosse saith, that the Earle of Bothwell did openly hand-fast, or espouse the said faire Lady, in the name of King Iames at Pauls-Crosse, being Saint Pauls day. This contract was brought about in manner following. After that the storme of warre had (by mediation as before said) beene throughly laid betweene the two sister-Nations, it chanced certaine of the Scots by their suspitious behauiour, and rough Phrases to prouoke the Garrison of Norham-Castell to issue, who in the bickering slew and hurt some of them, and droue the rest away. King * Iames expostulates this violence very sharply by letters with King Henry, who returned most satisfactory answeres. Richard Fox Bishop of Durham (whose the men and Castell were) wrote also many deprecatory letters, humbly praying the Scottish King to accept amends, whereunto he in the end inclined, and hauing some matters of farre greater moment to impart, desired the Bishops presence in Scotland, (knowing his deepe wisdome and great grace with his Soueraigne) which King Henry gladly assented vnto. The meeting was at Melrose, an Abbey of Cistertian Monkes, where the King abode, who hauing roundly vttered to the Bishop his offence conceiued for the breach of good termes at Norham-Castell, and yet being finally pleased to receiue satisfaction, he then secretly discouered his whole minde, the summe whereof was, That the King of England would be pleased to giue to him in marriage the Ladie Margaret his eldest daughter, as a pledge of indissoluble amitie. The Bishop promised his best diligence, and accordingly after his returne, laboured therein with King Henry, who most gladly hearkened thereunto. Whereupon the Scottish King sent the Archbishop of Glasco, the Earle of Bothwell, and others, to demand the Lady in marriage. Their entertainement was hearty and princely. But when the proposition came to scanning at the Councell-Table, it had not currant passage at first: for there were who objected as an inconuenience; That by this marriage the Crowne of England might come to the Scottish line, by the issue of Lady Margaret. Whereunto it is said, King Henry made this answere, * What if it should? for if any such thing should happen, (which Omen God forbid) I see it will come to passe, that our kingdome shall leese nothing thereby, because there will not be an accession of England to Scotland, but contrarily of Scotland vnto England, as to that which is far away the most noble head of the whole Iland, seeing that which is lesse vseth to accrue to the ornament and honour of that which is much the greater, as Normandy heretofore came to be vnder the dominion and power of the English our fore-fathers. When this was said, the whole boord of councell receiued it as an Oracle, and it went cleare about, That Margaret should be married to the King of Scotland. With this answere, and other instructions, the Scottish Ambassadors were sent home, who afterward returned into England with full authority and satisfaction to all Henries propositions, whereupon ensued the beforesaid publishment of assurances at Pauls-Crosse. It was a principall Article in this agreement: That no Englishman should enter Scotland, nor Scot into England without commendatory letters from their Soueraigne. Which Article was reputed a speciall meane to preserue the peace inuiolable.

(65) But ere the young Lady her selfe was conuaied into Scotland, her brother Prince Arthur died, and in * February next ensuing, their Mother also Queene Elizabeth, as shee lay in Child-bed within the Tower of London. The King to repaire his mind with fresh Consolations, in aduancing his onely remayning sonne, Henry Duke of Yorke, created him suddainely Prince of Wales, Earle of Chester & Flint, within few dayes after his Mothers decease. Thus was Arthurs losse supplied; howsoeuer. Henry made Prince, espoused soone after (* though with much reluctation) the Lady Katherine his elder Brothers widdow, * vpon the fiue and twentieth of Iune, at the Bishop of Salisburies house in Fleetstreete. And in this wise, by prouiding so worthy a wife for him, (though to say truth, her great Dower was the chiefe motiue) the King thought, that the estate of England was sufficiently setled; wherfore conuerting his cares to the accomplishment of affinity with Scotland, he most sumptuously furnished his deerest eldest daughter for her journey, and himselfe in person trauelled from Richmond as farre with her as Coleweston beside Northampton, where his Mother the Countesse lay: * after certaine dayes spent in solace, the King gaue her his blessing, with fatherly counsell and exhortation, exhortation, and committed the guard and conduct of her person principally to the Earles of Surrey and Northumberland, and to such Ladies and Gentlewomen as were appointed to that seruice; a great company of Lords, Knights, Esquiers, and men of Marke attending them as farre as Berwicke. At S^t. Lamberts Church in Lamer Moore within Scotland, the King attended by the principall of his Nobles, receiued her from the hands of the Earle of Northumberland, and the next yeare after, married her at Edenborough, in the presence of all his Nobility. The King gaue great entertainement to the English, and shewed them justing and other pastimes, after the Scottish fashion. The Scottish-men (saith * the Bishop of Rosse) were not behinde, but farre aboue the English-men, both in apparrell, rich Iewels, and massie chaines, many Ladies hauing their habiliments set with Gold-smith worke, garnisht with Pearle and Stone of price, with gallant and well-trapped horses. Diuerse Ladies also and young Gentlewomen of England, attending Queene Margaret, remained there, and were well married to certaine Noblemen of Scotland, whose progenie liues honourably there euen at these daies. The effect of this marriage is grauely described by the same Bishop in these words: There was perfect peace and sincere amity betweene the two Realmes of England and Scotland a long time after. And verily, during the life of King Henry the seuenth, no cause of breach was ministred by either of the Princes, but they continued in great loue and friendship, and mutuall societie, contracting of marriages, continuall enterchange of Merchandize betwixt the Subjects of both the Realmes, as they had beene AL vnder the obedience of ONE PRINCE; where-through, Iustice, Policy and Riches did flourish and abound throughout the whole Isle of Albion. And of this marriage is Iames the sixth descended, being that ONE PRINCE vnder whose obedience AL are now gouerned, as vnder the sole and lawfull lineall Monarch of Great-Britaine: for this Iames the fourth had Issue Iames the fift, hee had Issue Queene Mary, she had Issue our present Soueraigne, the great grand-childe of the said Queene Margaret eldest daughter of King Henrie the seauenth.

(66) Which effects of peace and riches, as they could not but be comfortable to so wise a King as Henry, they being the fruit as it were of his owne just labours; so let vs now obserue the last worldly cares of his raigne, and vpon what objects he fixed his minde, freed from the awe of open challenges of the Crowne, and from throwes at his maine, which with what art, valour and felicity, hee at first atchieued, and with how great hazards, troubles, and bloudie businesses, he brought it to such passe, that neighbour-Kings reputed it safe to enter-marry with his Family, wee haue already heard: Two principall poynts tooke vp the last Scenes of his life; for the rest of his time he wholly employed, eyther in the seruice of Almighty God (wherein hee was so diligent, that euery day he was present, after the deuotions of those times, at two or three Masses, oftentimes hearing godly Sermons,) or in building, wherewith he kept his senses busied. The one of the two chiefe poynts, was to watch ouer the waies of his wiues kindred (the remaining branches of the turbulent & vnfortunate house of Yorke) whose growth and greatnesse he supposed might at some time or other ouer-top his owne; the other was, vnder opinion of justice, to encrease his treasure out of the common purses, whereby hee seemed onerous to many, and somewhat obscured the brightnesse of his former glory, at least-wise diminished his opinion with the generality. Considering his courses holden with his wiues kindred, (the laterall issues and staddles of the Plantagenets) it fell out thus; which (by *occasion of the accidentall landing of Philip King of Spaine at this time, whereby the * Earle of Suffolkes taking was procured) wee thought it best to handle here together. Edmund de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, (sonne to Iohn Duke of Suffolke, and of Elizabeth sister to King Edward the fourth) in the sixteenth yeare of King Henries raigne, wilfully slew a common person in his fury. Henry not sorry to haue occasion of encreasing his popularity, by presenting so great a person to exemplary justice, and in the same act to blemish the honour of a man, whose quality was to him suspected, caused him for the same to be arraigned. The fact hee was perswaded to confesse, and thereupon had pardon. The Earle neuertheless, as a Prince of the bloud, holding himselfe disgraced, by hauing beene seene a Prisoner at the Kings-Bench-Barre, fled the Land discontented, and went to his Aunt the Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundie; but within a while after, being fairely reconciled, hee returned. After which, notwithstanding, whether it were by reason of debt (the certaine attendant of vaine-spirited, and base-braue-minded Courtiers) whereinto he had deepely throwne himselfe, for his furniture, at the celebration of his cousen Prince Arthurs marriage, or for that the restlesse spirit of enuy in the Dutchesse had preuailed, he taking his Brother with him, fled againe the next yeare after. The King, who had pardoned his life, seemed now to repent his clemency, * though it is plaine, hee spared him of purpose, till he might discouer more of a conspiracy which he knew was in hammering; but his flight troubled him not a little, knowing the violent humour of that Lord, and remembring to what a dangerous and bloudy issue his Brother the Earle of Lincolne had once already brought things at the battell of Stoke in the beginning of his raigne.

(67) For remedy, he betakes himselfe to his wonted arts, and therefore to learne the secrets of the enemy, Sir Robert Curson Knight (Captaine of the Castell of Hammes by Callis) faines himselfe a friend to the Earle, and flyes from his charge vnto him. An office vnworthy of Knighthood; neither can any good spirit in the world stoope it selfe to such double-faced employment, which besides the treacherous dissimulations thereof, cannot but be accompanied with wilfull impieties. For who is admitted into trust vpon a contrary side, without inuocations of Gods holy name, protestations, adjurations, oathes, the vtmost assurances which man can giue to man, to beget a conuenient affiance in his sinceritie? but by this stratagem the King ransackes the bosomes and cabinets of his aduersaries, discouering their designes and hopes. Whereupon, William Courtney Earle of Deuonshire (being most nobly descended, and hauing to his wife the Lady Katherine, one of the daughters of King Edward the fourth, and sister to Queene Elizabeth wife of King Henry) William de la Pole Brother to the said Edmund Earle of Suffolke, Sir Iames Tyrrell, Sir Iohn Windham Knights, with other, were attached, and committed to custody, and afterward also * George Neuill Lord Abergenie, and Sir Thomas Greene Knight, were likewise apprehended, but were soone deliuered. The Earle of Deuonshire, though innocent (for it is the misery of such great men, that their owne innocency cannot alwaies procure their owne safety; but their birthright many times, and often other mens designations without their least priuity, is enough to hazard them, yea it is in the power of any conspirator by bare nomination, to doe as much, so that it concernes them to haue an eye not to their owne onely, but to the behauiour also of their whole Alliances and dependancies) this Earle (I say) though innocent, remayned Prisoner during this Kings life, and some yeares of his Sonnes raigne, who set him at liberty. The other, William the Earle of Suffolkes Brother, had not so strict an hand holden ouer him. (68) This ſo round and quicke dealing with the Earles complices and fauourers, ſtartled his ſhallow and raw inuentions, and made their whole bulke to ſwarue and ſplinter; but the King reſted not ſo; for vpon the Sunday before the feaſt of SS. Simon and Iude, in the ſame yeare, of the ſaid executions, there was publiſhed at Pauls-Croſſe, by the Kings procurement from Pope Alexander the ſixt, a Bull of * Excommunication and curſe againſt the ſaide Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Curſon, and fiue other perſons by ſpeciall name, and generally all other which ayded the Earle againſt the King, to the diſturbance of the kingdome. Thus did the moſt prudent Henrie purſue his enemies, not onely with ſecret countermines and open weapons of Law, before they could aſſemble to make any ſhew, but alſo with ſpirituall lightening; which doubtleſſe, had they beene vpon juſt cauſe, and by lawfull authoritie fulminated, ought infinitely to be dreaded of good Chriſtians, becauſe (as Saint Paul ſaith) they deliuer ouer to Satan. Sir Robert Curſon was named, of purpoſe, to make the Earle ſecure of him; which may well be called a perillous, if not a prophane deuiſe, though his Holineſſe were made the inſtrument thereof. Neither did the King leaue here, for by his Letters and Meſſengers he ſo preuailed with Pope * Alexander, as hee decreed by his Bull, That no perſon ſhould afterward haue priuiledge of Sanctuary, who had once taken the ſame, and come forth againe: and that, * if any Sanctuarie-man ſhould afterward commit any murther, robbery, ſacriledge, treaſons, &c. hee ſhould by lay force be drawne thence to ſuffer due puniſhment. This was of great vſe to the King, and preſerued many Subjects from precipitation, for the abuſe of Sanctuaries had beene an efficient of many troubles. But the ſame Pope (hauing ſent Iohn Giglis his Receiuer, to gather money in England) ſhewed himſelfe much more fauourable to ſuch as perpetrated thoſe ſaid hainous offences, as alſo, Vſury, Symony, Rapines, Adulteries, or whatſoeuer offences, (excepting certaine offences againſt the Pope and Clergy, &c.) when hee ſent a * Bull of Pardons (for money) to all ſuch offendors in England; diſpenſing alſo thereby, with ſuch, as kept away, or by any fraud had gotten the goods of other men, which they ſhould now retaine ſtill without ſcruple of conſcience, ſo as they paid a ratable portion thereof vnto his Holineſſe Receiuers. Sir Robert Curſon (though before accurſed by the Pope) returnes, when he ſaw fit time, into England, and withall into wonted fauour with his Soueraigne. The Earle, ſeeing himſelfe thus ſtript of all hope to doe much harme, wandred about Germany and France to finde repoſe, but in the end quite tyred, hee put himſelfe into the grace and protection of Philip then in Flanders, who by the death of Iſabella was King of Spaine, in right of Ioan his wife, eldeſt daughter of Ferdinando and Iſabella; where he remayned in baniſhment, till King Philip was driuen by tempeſt in the moneth of Ianuary into England, as hee meant to haue paſſed through the ſleeue, or Engliſh Ocean, into Spaine, there to take poſſeſſion of that Kingdome, and other the appurtinances.

(69) The chiefe Ship of the Nauie-Royall, wherein the King was, and two other (all the reſt being ſcattered by the fury of the weather into ſeuerall places and other Ports of England,) thruſt into Harbour at * Falmouth. Himſelfe weary and ſicke with the violent toſſings of the Sea (whereunto hee had neuer, as it ſeemes, beene vſed,) would needes come on ſhoare, and refreſh his ſpirits, though the principall men about him diſſwaded that courſe, as foreſeeing it would procure a longer ſtay, then the nature of their occaſions would perhaps well beare. And ſo indeed it fell out, for being now in another Princes (though his friends) dominions, where hee had no power ouer himſelfe, nor others, and the rumour of arriuall ſtirring the men in authority thereabout; Sir Thomas Trenchard Knight with the ſudden forces of the countrey, not knowing what the matter might be, came thither, and vnderſtanding the royall quality of the perſon, inuited him with all humble humanity to his houſe, and forthwith diſpatched poſtes to Court; not long after Sir Iohn Caro Knight, (with a great troupe of armed men) repaired alſo, purſuing the like humble entreaties; which the King, fearing conſtraint, becauſe they were but ſubjects, and durſt not let him paſſe without their Lord & Maſters leaue neceſſarily yeelded vnto. Vpon notice of this mighty Princes caſuall arriuall, King Henry preſently commanded the Earle of Arundel to entertaine him till himſelfe could come, who very magnificently did ſo, with * three hundred Horſes by Torch-light; and in the meane-while King Henry himſelfe prepares. Philip perceiuing, that whatſoeuer ſpeed his affaires required, yet now there was no remedy but to ſtay, thought not good to expect his approach, but to preuent it, and came vpon the ſpurre to Windſore, that he might be gone againe the ſooner, after whom Queene Ioan his Wife came leaſurably. The reſt of this entertainement, becauſe it hath matter of weight, and is well ſet downe by Polydor Virgil, it ſhall ſuffice vs to follow his footſteps. At Windſore, the two Kings, after long and ſeuerall diſcourſes, began to conferre about renewing their league. Henrie required that Edmund Earle of Suffolke might be deliuered vp into his power, which Philip denyed to be a thing that he could doe, as holding it moſt vnreaſonable to be the author of his death, whom hee had taken into Protection: but when at the laſt he found, that no excuſe nor reaſon could ſatisfie, for that, Henrie voluntarily offered to ſaue the Earles life, he promiſed to do therein what he deſired, and preſently tooke order for his ſending ouer. According whereunto, King Henrie (to draw out the time, till hee had the wiſhed prey) conuayed King Philip to London, to ſhew him the head Citie of his Kingdome, out of which, after a little ſtay, he re-conducted him. The Earle in the meane time, who conceyued horror at the firſt newes of King Philips landing in England, as fatall to him, and reſolued that no hope was longer to be repoſed in the faith of forraine Princes, came ouer not vnwillingly, preſuming that after pardon of life, hee might alſo in time re-gaine his liberty; or if that hope fayled, yet ſhould he at leaſt-wiſe obtaine to die, and be buried in his Countrey. But King Philip and his Queene, hauing feaſted with her ſiſter the Princeſſe of Wales, departed England. The Earle was brought through Flanders to Callis vpon the ſixteenth of March, and landed at Douer vpon the foure & twentieth of the ſame, conuayed thither by Sir Henrie Wyat, and Sir Iohn Wiltſhire, with threeſcore men in armour of the Garriſon of Callis; and at Douer Sir Iohn Louel and others receyuing him, guarded him ſafe to the Tower of London. King Philip, not long after his landing in Spaine deceaſed, being not thirtie yeares olde. That tempeſt which draue him into England, was holden by the people as prodigious; for it blew downe the Golden-Eagle from the famous Spire of Pauls-Steeple (being of Copper, richly ouer-guilt, of forty pounds weight, in length foure foot, and in bredth three,) which alſo in the fall thereof, brake and battered the ſigne of the Blacke Eagle, in Pauls-Church-yard, in the place where now the Schoole-houſe ſtands. This accident euen then made ſome conjecture, that the Emperour Maximilian (whoſe Imperiall Enſigne the Eagle is) ſhould ſuffer ſome loſſe accordingly (ſaith Polydor) as indeed he did by the death of King Philip his ſonne. Which (if any ſuperſticiouſly delight in Calculations of that blinde nature) we may well paralell with that * lightning which ſtroke the Letter C. out of Cæſar in the inſcription of Cæſar Auguſtus his ſtatue; whereupon it was gathered, that Auguſtus ſhould liue but one hundreth daies after, and then be called a God, (Æſar the remaining ſyllables ſo ſignifying in the olde Hetruſcan tongue,) which accordingly hapned.

(70) Thus was the Earle of Suffolke brought backe, and the King anchored his quiet at the safe custody of his person within the Tower. The other worldly poynt wherein he chiefely bestowed his ages care, was to gather money, though by courses seeming very grieuous and full of bitternesse; the too-griping greedinesse, and too-profuse lauishnesse of money in Princes, being both alike offensiue to a well-setled estate. Some excuse his doings herein (amongst whom Polydor is chiefe) as not proceeding from any deprauation or vncorrected affection of his nature; but from an opinion and fore-cast of generall profit: becausea Princes humour of gathering, tendeth, though with distaste of particular men, to the good publique, whereas his profusenesse, though with some particular mens profit, endeth in the empouerishment of the whole. And Henry himselfe protested (saith Polydor) hee did it not for loue of money, but with a purpose to bridle the fierce mindes of a Nation bred vp among factions: though they (saith the same Author) who felt the smart, and were wounded by his Instruments,)* cried out they were not so much the darts of seuerity, which did hit them, as of auarice. Yet Polydors Apologie may be current: for it is not to be doubted, but that such vse the King might propound himselfe; and yet withall, wee can hardly finde any commendable root thereof, the wayes being so importune and harsh, by which hee raised money. Let vs heare in this poynt the obseruatiue *Knight. Of nature (saith he) Henry coueted to accumulate treasure, which the people (into whom there is infused, for the preseruation of Monarchies, a naturall desire to discharge their Princes, though it be with the vnjust charge of their Counsellors and Ministers) did impute vnto Cardinall Morton, and Sir Reinald Bray, who (as it afterward appeared) as Counsellors of ancient authoritie with him, did so sound his humour, as neuertheless they tempered it. Where it is truely said, it afterward appeared: for till they were gone to account to God, and his feare for the maine quite banished, the King did not let loose the reines to his immoderate desire of hauing, which yet was not more sinnefull, then the meanes vnder him practised, were odious. *For * Empson and Dudley that followed, being persons that had no reputation with him, otherwise then the seruile following of his owne humors, gaue him way, and shaped him weanes to those extremities, whereby himselfe was touched with remorse at his death, and which his successor disauowed.* And this we take to be a true judgement. To be particular in the recitall of things worthy to dye in forgetfulnesse, is not onely to recite, but in a sort to teach them also, as some, who by broad inuectiues, haue as it were read a lecture of those vices, against which they haue pretended to inueigh. But publique and shamefull Arts may more safely be deliuered. The instruments whom the King set on worke, (or who perhaps set the King on worke) were * two Lawyers, Richard Empson, (afterward knighted) and Edmund Dudley Esquier; their employment was to call the richer subject into question for breach of old penall lawes, long before discontinued and forgotten, whereby they brake in vpon the people, as it were at vnaware, like a kinde of authorized robbers, masked vnder the pretext of seruice for the King, and the names of Delators or Promotors, a * familiar sickenesse in the times of ancient Tyrannies. But the courses to execute their employment, were void of all conscience and colour. For one of them was to * outlaw persons secretly, and then to seise their estates, driuing them to chargefull compositions with the King, and heauy bribes to the Authors of their trouble. More detestable was another practise of theirs: For there were false Iurors and ring-leaders of false Iurors, who would neuer giue any verdict against the will of their patrons, the said Empson and Dudley; so that if any durst stand out vpon triall, the destiny of their causes was squared forth by the leaden rule of those fellows consciences; which to be a truth, the expiatory punishment which King Henry the eight tooke of them in the first yeare of his raigne, doth clearely conuince. By these meanes many honest and worthy Subjects were rigorously fined, imprisoned, or otherwise afflicted, which filled the Land with sorrow and repinings. Among very many others thus abused, Sir William Capell Alderman of London was eminent, as from whom, in the tenth yeare of the Kings raigne, had beene scruzed, vnder the colour of moth-eaten and vn-reuiued Lawes, aboue sixteene hundreth pounds sterling, and was now againe plaide at a-fresh, and another hand drawne vpon him for two thousand pounds, which becausehe would not pay, hee was by Dudley commaunded prisoner to the Tower; but by the death of the King which ensued, all such Prisoners were released. If any perhaps will slight the hard vsage extended to Citizens, and to the like, they are vnwise therein, neither thinke as Patriots ought. For though it may so fall out that the personall vexation of some few, merits no great pitty; yet the example is pestilent; and it is a part of the cunning, to choose out at first such for patternes, as vpon whose persons least compassion may fall, which examples may afterward bee extended to whomsoeuer. These reuels and rages against the wealthier sort continued, till it pleased GOD to sting the Kings heart with just compunction, toward the horror of his death; who had the fauour from Heauen, as to lye sicke of a consuming disease, which wasted him by such insensible degrees, as gaue him the vse of his whole selfe (as it were) till the last gaspe, whereby he had meanes to recollect himselfe, after those many soule-wounding assaults which attend regall greatnesse, and to submit his thoughts to such ghostly admonishments (touching another life) whereunto in daies of health, the hearts or eares of great Princes are seldome attentiue.

(71) About the yeare of his death, hauing vnderstood that Lewis King of France, despayring of Issue-Male, had annulled the Contracts made betweene Charles King of Spaine, (sonne of the late King Philip, and afterward elected Emperour by the name of Charles the fift) and the Lady Claudia his eldest daughter, whom he newly betrothed to Francis of Valois Dolphin of France, and Duke of Angolesme; King Henry (whose care for preseruation of the common quiet, and good of his Countrey, by forraine alliances, was euer wholy in him & awake) thought it a faire occasion for him to match his younger daughter the Lady Marie. The French King to haue the aduise of Iames the fourth King of Scots, in the bestowing the said Madam Claudia his eldest Daughter, had before sent Bernard Steward Lord Dobignie, and the President of Tholouz, Ambassadours for that purpose; who finally in effect receyued this answere: * That the saide King Iames thought it best that his eldest daughter should be married within his owne Realme of France; for if she were married vpon any forraine Prince, it might giue colour to claime title to the said Realme afterward. And if he did marry her at home, rather to him the saide Francis, whom he had appointed to succeed then any other. Which resolution was very acceptable to King Lewis, becausе it jumped with his owne purpose, and it was followed accordingly. King Henry therefore hearing that King Charles might be obtained, so pursued the poynt *by the prudent managing of Richard Fox (now Bishop of Winchester) his Ambassadour, that King Charles his Ambassadours comming out of Flanders, where hee was educated, and meeting him at Callis, the affaire was opened, disputed, concluded, and the Lady Mary, then about ten yeares of age, (as King Charles himselfe) was by solemne contract assured to him for wife.

(72) Now therefore his sonne Henry Prince of Wales, being heire of the Crowne, and married; his eldest daughter, the Lady Margaret, Queene of Scotland; the Lady Mary his youngest, prouided for so highly (though in the end it came to nothing) all likelihood

A right noble, wiſe, victorious, and renowned King, and one whoſe pietie would haue beene farre more eminent then all his other vertues, if from the beginning the malignant quality of the times would haue permitted him to liue in quiet. Hee ſpecially honoured the remembrance of that Saint-like Man, Henry the ſixt, the founder of his Family, and Propheticall fore-teller of that fortune which now he died ſeiſed of, whom alſo hee laboured to haue * Canonized for a Saint, but that Pope Iulio held that honour at too high a rate. It is reckoned by ſome Writers * of that age among his principall glories, that three Popes, Alexander the ſixth, Pius the third, and Iulius the ſecond, did in their ſeuerall times, with authority and conſent of the Cardinals, elect and chooſe him for chiefe defenſor of Chriſts Church, before all other Chriſtian Princes. In his laſt Will and Teſtament, after the diſpoſition of his Soule and Body, he deuiſed and willed Reſtitution ſhould be made of all ſuch monyes as had vnjuſtly beene leuied by his Officers. A moſt pious and truely Chriſtian care, whereby alſo appeareth, that he hoped the wrongs done vnder him were not ſo enormous nor innumerable, but that they might fall within the poſſibility of redreſſe. The deſcription of his whole man, is had in the beginning of his life, and the courſe thereof deſcribed in his Actions. (71) Elizabeth, the firſt Childe Legitimate, and eldeſt Daughter of King Edward the Fourth, was at the age of nineteene, vpon the eighteenth of Ianuarie, and yeare of Chriſt Ieſus 1485. married vnto King Henry the Seauenth, whereby was vnited the long-contending Families of Lancaſter and Yorke, and the Roſes Red and White joyned into one, to the great joy of the Engliſh Subjects. She was crowned at VVeſtminſter vpon the fiue and twentieth of Nouember, the third of her Husbands Raigne, and of Grace 1487. Shee was his Wife eighteene yeares, and twentie foure dayes, and died in Childebed in the Tower of London, the eleauenth of February, euen the day of her owne Natiuitie, the eighteenth of her Husbands raigne, and yeare of our Saluation, 1503. and is buried at VVeſtminſter in the moſt magnificent Chappell and rich Monument of Copper and gilt, where ſhee with her husband lieth entombed.

His Iſſue.

(72) Arthur, the eldeſt Sonne of King Henrie the Seauenth, and of Queene Elizabeth his wife, was borne at Wincheſter the twentieth day of September, the yeare of Grace, one thouſand foure hundred eightie ſixe, and the ſecond of his Fathers raigne. In whoſe fifth yeare he was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, and Earle of Cheſter, and at the age of fifteene yeares, one moneth and twenty fiue dayes, vpon the foureteenth of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand fiue hundred and one, eſpouſed the Lady Katherine, daughter to Ferdinando King of Spaine, ſhe being then about eighteene yeares of age, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, London; and preſently ſent into Wales, the better to gouerne that principality by his owne Preſence, enjoyed his marriage bed onely foure moneths and nineteene dayes, departing this life at Ludlow the ſecond of Aprill, the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand fiue hundred and two, of his Fathers raigne ſeauenteene, and of his owne age fifteene yeares, ſixe moneths, and thirteene dayes. His body, with all due funerall ſolemnities, was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Maries in Worceſter, where, in the South-ſide of the Quire he remaineth entombed in Touch, or Ietre, without any remembrance of him by picture.

(73) Henrie, the ſecond ſonne of King Henrie the ſeauenth, and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Greenwich in the Countie of Kent, the two and twentieth of Iune, in the yeare of Grace, one thouſand foure hundred ninetie and one, being the ſeauenth of his Fathers raigne. In his Infancy he was created Duke of Yorke, and Marſhall of England, and ſo trained vp in his youth to literature, as hee was righ.ly accounted the beſt learned Prince in Europe, and, by the death of his Brother, ſucceeded his Father in all his Dominions; whoſe Raigne and Acts are preſently to be related.

(74) Edmund, the third ſonne of King Henrie, and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne in the yeare of Chriſt, one thouſand foure hundred ninetie fiue, and in his young yeares was created Duke of Sommerſet, which Title he no long time enjoyed, being taken away by death at Biſhops-Hatfield, before hee attained fully to fiue yeares of age, the yeare of Grace, one thouſand foure hundred ninetie and fiue, and fifteenth of his Fathers Raigne, his Body lyeth interred at Saint Peters in VVeſtminſter.

(75) Margaret, the eldeſt Daughter of King Henrie, and of Lady Elizabeth his Queen, was borne the nine and twentieth day of Nouember, the yeare of Chriſt 1489. and fifth of her fathers raigne; ſhe at the age of foureteene was married vnto Iames the Fourth King of Scotland, the yeare of our Lord one thouſand fiue hundred and three, vnto whom ſhee bare Iames the fifth, Arthur and Alexander, and a Daughter: which laſt three, dyed all of them young; and, after the death of King Iames (being ſlain at Flodden-field in fight againſt the Engliſh,) ſhe was re-married vnto Archibald Douglas Earle of Anguiſſe, in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand fiue hundred and foureteene, vnto whom ſhee bare Margaret, afterward eſpouſed vnto Matthew Earle of Lennox, Father by her of the Lord Henrie, who died at the age of nine moneths, and lyeth interred in the vpper end of the Chancel in the Pariſh-Church of Stepney neere London, vpon whoſe Graue is engrauen in Braſſe, as followeth:

(76) Elizabeth, the ſecond Daughter of King Henry and Lady Elizabeth his Queene, was borne the ſecond day of Iuly, one thouſand foure hundred ninety two, and died the foureteenth of September, and yeare of Chriſt, one thouſand foure hundred ninety fiue, and is interred at Weſtminſter.

(77) Mary, the third bloſſome of the Imperiall Roſe-tree of England, was firſt wife to Lewis King of France, who liued not long after, and died without iſſue by her. Her ſecond Husband was that Martiall and pompous Gentleman, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

(78) Katherine, fourth Daughter of this ſeauenth Henrie, and of Elizabeth his Queene, was borne vpon Candlemas-day, in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand fiue hundred and three, and in the eighteenth yeare of her Fathers raigne, who was called vnto a far better Kingdome within a ſhort while after.

CHAPTER XXI.

An.D.1509.

THe rich and wiſe King (Henrie the ſeauenth) gone (as is ſaid) the way of all fleſh, his Sonne bearing the ſame name, a moſt magnanimous and heroicall Prince, ſucceeded in his Throne ouer all his Dominions, as the onely true heire vnto the Crowne, by both the Houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke. His birth was at Greenwich, in the yeare of Grace, 1491. the twentieth two of Iune: and his youth ſo trained vp in literature, that he was accounted the moſt learned Prince of all Chriſtendome, indued with parts moſt beſitting a King, both in lineaments of body, and liberality of minde, beſides his ripe knowledge in politicke affaires, and was made the more agreeable to the affections of men, by the conſideration of his flouriſhing age, as hauing not attained vnto nineteene at his fathers death. In his infancy he was created Duke of Yorke; at twelue yeares (his Brother deceaſed) Prince of Wales, and at eighteene became ſole Monarch of the Land, when at VVeſtminſter vpon Sunday the twenty fift of Iune, euen the feſtiuall of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, and yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, 1509. he with his beauteous Queene Katherine receyued their Crownes at the hands of William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, no Prince giuing better hopes vnto juſtice, or ſeeking the wealth of his ſubjects more then himſelfe.

Theſe men, King Henry the ſeauenth had made his Inſtruments for the finding out of offenders in his penall Statutes, themſelues being learned in the Lawes, and apt inough to execute their Commiſſions to the full: for, by their daily informations and recouering of fines, they digged and brought a ſiluer Mine into the Kings Exchequer, ſome veines whereof by the way, ranne alſo into their owne coffers, to the great vexation of all, and vtter vndoing of many; whereat the Noblemen grudged, the Gentility repined, the Commons lamented, and all of them felt the teeth of theſe rauening Wolues: But the Father-King departed, and his Sonne ſet on his Throne; the complaints of the oppreſſed ſo oppreſſed the King and his Councell, that Dudley and Empſon were ſent priſoners to the Tower, and both of them by Parliament attainted of Treaſon.

(3) Edmund Dudley by deſcent was a Gentleman, and by profeſſion a Lawyer, hauing both wit and words at will; had he not abuſed both, to his owne deſtruction. Richard Empſon his inferiour by birth, was the ſonne of a poore Sieue-maker, but yet had he ſtepped before him to the degree of a Knight: Theſe night-ſprung Muſhrumps that ſucked the earthes fatneſſe, from farre better plants then themſelues, ſaw not the many hands ready to plucke them vp by the rootes, when the ſeaſon ſhould ſerue to cleare the Land of ſuch weeds: for albeit they had their diſcharge vnder the Kings owne hand to doe what they did, and their ſeruice knowne Crowne-ſeruice, a matter impugnable, yet no ſooner were they left to ſtand vpon their owne baſis, but that they felt the weight of their done wrongs too importunable for them any longer to beare; for ſo importune were all degrees againſt them, that Dudley forthwith in Guild-hall London was arraigned and condemned to dye: and King Henry in progreſſe, (through the cry of the people) could take no pleaſure, till he had ſent for Empſon into Northamptonſhire, where among them he was arraigned, and receiued ſentence of death, which was ſo deſired and followed, as to ſatisfie his Subjects, the King ſent a ſpeciall writ for their executions, which with great joy of all was performed vpon Tower-hill, by taking from them their heades; when they left their riches to be ſpent by others, and their names to remaine vpon Record for the Caterpillers of thoſe times: whoſe like, if any ſuch liue, ſhall leaue their hatefull remembrance to the like ſtaines of reproachfull infamy, how pleaſing ſoeuer the promotion ſo gotten in their owne eyes ſhall ſeeme, or the employments in their ſelfe-conceits accounted profitable to the State.

(4) This juſtice of King Henry wanne him great praiſe of his people, and his charity extended towards London, when that City was ſore diſtreſſed with famine, by ſending ſixe hundred quarters of corne, great loue; ſo that neuer any King entred his raigne with better hopes then himſelfe. That his perſon was tall, is not to be doubted, though not like vnto Sauls, as ſome haue alledged, whoſe report is, that at the ſiege of Bulloigne, he was higher by the head then any in his Campe, and euery joynt proportionable to ſo royall a ſtature: but that hee was ſtrong, his many Iuſts and Tilts, and fights at Tournay, (moſt dangerouſly performed) was manifeſted vpon them that vnder-went his heauy hand: for at Tilt he bare downe a man at Armes both horſe and all, and threw Sir William Kingſton a Knight of great ſtrength to the ground at Barriers; with Battell-axe he combated againſt one Giot a Germane, very ſtrong and tall, and lent him better blowes then he could againe re-pay.

K. Henries juſtice and charity commended.

(5) His glorie thus mounted the Trophie of fame, and young Henry the onely morning-ſtarre in this Weſterne Orbe; Pope Iulius the ſecond, fearing the further incroch of the French, who then had entred into ſome part of Italy, thought this Prince the ſtrongeſt pillar whereunto to truſt, and the fitteſt Carde to trumpe the French King, well knowing the Title that the Engliſh Kings had vnto France, and the readineſſe of his Subjects to forward that way: whereupon writing his letters vnto King Henrie, complained againſt Lewis the French King, and twelfth of that name, who neither (as hee alledged) eſteeming of God, good fame, nor conſcience, detained the reuenewes of the Clergy, ſupported the Cardinall William to aſpire the Papacy, ayded in the ſiege of Bonen Alfonſo of Ferrara, and the Bentenoly, both traitors to the Papall Sea, where hee intended to lay the foundation of his Empire, to vſurpe all Italy, beſought him for the pitty of our Sauiour, and by the vertue of his famous anceſtors, (for I vſe the words of the Popes briefe) that neuer forſooke the Church of God in diſtreſſe, and by the filiall obedience, the ſtrongeſt bond, to enter into the holy league, they hauing elected him againſt Lewis, Caput fœderis Italici.

(6) And indeed to ſpeake as it was, Lewis much emulated King Henries greatneſſe, fearing that fortune would giue him occaſions to make his claime by ſword vnto the Kingdome of France; which the ſooner he did by this holy fathers inſtigations, and by his Herauld Clarentiux roughly demanded, the Dutchies of Normandy, Guyen, Anjou, and Mayne, and with them alſo the Crowne that King Lewis ware. The Scottiſh King likewiſe, in caſe of Andrew Barton ſlaine in his Piracies (as the Engliſh alledged) by the Admirall of England, accounted the truce-broken, and ſought the reuenge vpon the Borders adjoyning. Againſt theſe two Nations young Henry at once prepared, and happily obtained faire victories againſt both: but the ſucceſſe of the one, (though not following preciſely the time) we meane to relate before we enter diſcourſe of the other.

(9) Then was the battery brought ſo neere their wals, that many breaches were therein made, and the Towne by compoſition yeelded vnto the King; whereupon the Earle of Shrewsbury was ſent to ſee all things ſafe, who ſtucke vpon the higheſt Turret the Banner of Saint George, and tooke the oath of alleagiance of all the French Citizens, to acknowledge King Henry their ſupreame Lord: This done, the King as a Conquerour entreth Terwin, ſent thence their

(10) Then was the siege remoued vnto Tournay: about which City King Henry commanded diuers Trenches to be cast, and placed his Ordnance to such aduantage, that none might enter in, or come out of the same. Into this Towne a great number of the French from the Countries adioyning had lately fled, relying much vpon the strength and safety of the place, which indeed had euer beene accounted so inuincible, that this sentence was engraued ouer one of the gates. Iannes ton me à perdeu ton pucellage, Thou hast neuer lost thy maiden-head: Notwithstanding, it was yeelded vp vnto Henry with ten thousand pounds sterling for the Citizens redemption, who to the number of fourescore thousand, then tooke their oathes to become his true Subiects, and foure of their principall bare vp the Canopie, vnder which the King in triumph-wise entred, hauing boren before him his Sword, Axe, Speare, and other abiliments of warre, euery Citizen holding a staffe-Torch for his light. The safe keeping of this City the King committed to Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Order of the Garter, whom hee there made his Lieutenant, and ordained Thomas Wolsey his Almoner the Bishop of Tournay. The yeare now spent, and season vnfit for the field, a surcease from warre was determined vntill the next spring; whereupon all were shipped for England, with full payment, and praise, but Terwin and Tournay stucke heauily vpon the French mens hearts.

(11) King Lewis thus endammaged in his owne Dominions, thought it best pollicy to pay like for like, to which end at the first attempts against Terwin hee solicited Iames the fourth of that name, King of Scotland (though brother by marriage vnto King Henry of England) to disturbe the peace of his Subiects, that so hee might bee drawne out of France; which Iames for his part put presently in practise: for writing his letters to Henry in the French Kings behalfe, charged him with breach of Truce, both in the case of his Scots slaine at the Sea, as also against his Confederates the Duke of Gelder, and King of France, against which last he desired him to desist, otherwise hee should bee forced to reuenge the Frenches wrongs vpon his English: and to giue Letters of Mart to recouer the losses of his Subiects.

(12) King Henry a Prince of a Maiesticall spirit, most highly offended at these his Brothers requests, and threates, was so farre ouer-gone with fury and rage, that Lions King at Armes the bringer, was thereby somewhat daunted at his present answere, which hee desired might be sent in writing, refusing to carry in words his reply to his Soueraigne. This Heralds wise and weighty request was forthwith granted, and Letters framed to King Iames demands, answering those imputations with rough and round words, which notwithstanding he neuer read or saw, being slaine in the battell of Flodden, before that Lions could come to deliuer the same.

Lions terrified at king Henries answeres. See the contents of this Letter in Holinshead, dated from the Campe at the siege of Terwin the 12. of August. A. D. 1513.

(13) For Iames King of Scots preparing for war, had in the meane while entred the borders, and with his Ordnance battered and wonne the Castell of Norham; making still forward vpon the English. Against whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey made the Kings Lieutenant of the North at his going into France, assembled an Army of twenty sixe thousand strong, vnto whom came his Sonne the Lord Admirall of England, with a great supply of good Souldiers well-appointed for warre. The Earle from Newcastell came vnto the water of Till, and pitched his battell besides a little Towne called Brankeston, vnder Flodden hill, a mountaine lying in the North of Northumberland, betwixt the Riuers Till and Tweed, where vpon a rising banke, the Scottish hoast had taken the aduantage of the ground: vnto King Iames, Thomas Earle of Surrey sent Rouge-Crosse a Pursuant at Armes, with proffer of battell to be done vpon Friday the ninth of September, if so it pleased his Highnesse, who withall carried this message from the Lord Admirall, that he was come in person to iustifie his act against Andrew Barton, and would abide the last drop of his bloud in the Vant-gard of the field.

(14) King Iames most readily accepted the offer, and by his Herald Hay sent the Earle word, that if hee were as then in Edenbrough, yet would he most gladly come to fulfill his desire; and withall sent his Letters for the iust occasions giuen him to inuade England as hee did. The day approached, and the Scots keeping the higher ground, the Earle marched vpward along the Riuer, and by two Bridges passed ouer with his hoast, making still forward, as though he ment either to haue taken into Scotland, or else to circumuent King Iames his returne, which hee perceiuing, hasted downe the hill, putting from him his horse, raised his royall Standard, and as a most valiant Chiefetaine encouraged his Souldiers to the fight.

(15) The Scottish Ordnance discharged from aboue, ouer-shot the English with very small dammage, and the ground of no difficult assent, gaue them the easier accesse, so that Sir Edmund Howard, who led a wing to the Vant-gard (whereof his Brother the Admirall was Captaine) got almost to the height; against whom the Earles of Lenox and Argile, with their Battels of Speares on foot so violently encountred, that they beat downe and brake the wing of the English, wherein many were slaine, and the Horsemen disbanded, and put to flight; but presently recalled, ioyned themselues againe to the great battell, which by this time had attained to the toppe of the hill. King Iames that saw this first brunt performed, made full account that the day was his owne, supposing verily the English had fled, and therefore most valiantly hee aduanced forward, not staying for the reregard to second his battell, and encountring the Earles Battalion, a bloudy fight was performed, with the losse and life of many a man: but strength neere spent, and the Scottish somewhat disioyned, through force of a great shore of Arrowes falling among them; Sir Edward Stanley hauing three bands reserued for the like purpose, with a fresh on-set inuaded the open sides of the enemy, whose force was so violent, that the Scots no longer were able to stand, but tooke downe the hill vnto flight, which the Earles of Lenox and Argile perceiuing, did their best to stay them, and fighting most valiantly, themselues were slaine in the same place.

(16) King Iames then perceiuing the wings of his Battell distressed and gone, and that the enemy began to enclose him about; with a stout resolution incouraged his men, willing them to regard the person of their King, their owne honour, their valiant Ancestors, and now their present employments; that their bloud might bee bought deare to the English, and the Scottish valours recorded for euer in the volumes of Fame for this their one daies worke; & thervpon rushing among the thickest began a most eager and bloudy battell, & piercing through with a strong hand went so far, that he had almost ouerthrown the Earles Standard: thus busied in doubtfull chance, the Lord Howard and Sir Edward Stanley hauing discomfited the enemy in either wing, returned in the face of the maine battell, and the Lord Dacres with his Horse-men came vpon their backes, so that the Scottish were forced to fight in a round compasse, but being ouer-layd, the Kings Standard was strucken downe, and himselfe most valiantly fighting slaine in the middest of his enemies: with whom died three Bishops, whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrewes the Kings base sonne, two Abbots, twelue Earles, and seauenteene Lords, Knights, Knights and Gentlemen a great number, in all about eight thousand, and almost as many taken prisoners, saith Paulus Iouius.

(17) The next day, when the Scouts had found the field cleared of enemies, and the English busied to bury their dead: the body of King Iames was found slaine among the rest, hauing receiued many bloudy wounds, and most of them deadly: for his sides were stucke thicke with sharpe arrowes, his necke cut into the middest, and his left hand in two places almost cut quite off. These wounds notwithstanding, he was descryed, and knowne by the Lord Dacres, and others to be the King: and thereupon his body bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in Lead, was solemnely brought vnto the Monastery of Shine in Surrey, where no doubt it was honourably enterred: but at the dissolution of that House, in the daies of King of Edward the sixt, it was (as almost all other Monuments were) disturbed of rest, and throwne into a waste roome among olde Timber, Stone, and Lead, which Iohn Stowe, the Relater saith, himselfe so saw: and further declareth (let him be the Author) that the seruants of Launcelot Young Glasier to the late Queene, being at Shine in new glasing the windowes, either vpon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the rest: but smelling the sweet perfumes of the balmes, gaue it to their Master, who opening the Lead, found therein the Head of a man retaining fauour, though the moysture were cleane dried vp, whose haire both of Head and Beard was red, which after he had well viewed, and a while kept, he caused to be buried in S. Michaels at Woodstreet London, the Church of the Parish wherin himselfe dwelled.

(18) Notwithstanding this faire tale of Iohn Stow, Iohn Lesly Bishop of Rosse affirmeth, that it was held for certaine, the body thus found, was the body of the Laird Bonehard then slaine in the battell: and that King Iames was seene aliue the same night at Kelso, whence hee passed vnto Ierusalem, and there spent the rest of his daies in holy contemplation: but howsoeuer it is (saith he) he neuer was seen any more in Scotland, no more then Charles Duke of Burgundy was in his Countrey after the Battell of Nanze: howbeit his people held a vaine opinion that he escaped, and would againe shortly returne. This battell was fought vpon the ninth of September, the yeare 1513. and is commonly called the battell of Floddon, or Floddon field: whence with victory, the Earle Generall departed with the embalmed body of King Iames, whom hee presented vnto Queene Katherine, who with the Gauntlet of the slaine King sent the newes of the victory vnto her Lord King Henry, then lying in his siege before the Towne Terwin.

(19) But as these his proceedings went prosperously forward, and his fame daily spread in further parts, so the Flemmings (who hitherto had held side with his sailes) began to fall off suddenly, vpon the occasion as followeth. It had beene concluded betwixt King Henry the seauenth, and Philip King of Spaine, that Charles his eldest sonne should marry Mary the younger daughter of the English King, with a Princely Dowry agreed vpon, but she being young, and not ten yeares of age, and the Castilian vnable to giue assurance of her pension assigned, that match went not forward during the life of her Father, howbeit King Henry her brother regarding greatly her honour, prouided for the marriage, and signified so much to the Counsell of Flanders: who dallied him off with many excuses, and lastly sent him word they could not receiue her that yeare.

(20) This therefore gaue Lewis King of France occasion to hammer at a peace, and making Pope Leo his, they both together put it in practise; the readier was Henry to listen thereunto, both for the loue he bore to his sister, and for the great regard he held of the Apostolike See, whence Iulius the second, and this Popes Predecessor had lately sent him a Cappe of Maintenance and Sword, and by decree of Councell giuen him the Title Christianissimo; which were receiued with great thankes, and solemnities. The French Kings desire was to marry the said Lady Mary, whose dowry hee assigned to be thirty two thousand Crownes by yeare, during her naturall life, couenanting further to pay vnto King Henry her brother the summe of one hundred thousand Crowns annually for fiue yeares continuance.

(21) Peace thus concluded, the Lady Mary with an honourable Company was shipped at Douer, the Duke of Norfolke, the Marquesse Dorset, and the Earle of Salisbury, being her chiefe conductors: whose fleet had not passed two leagues at Seas, but that a sudden tempest arose, and so violently raised the waues, as their Ships were seuered each from others, some into Flaunders, some into Callis, and hers with great difficulty struke in at Bulloigne, where by Boates her traine was landed, and her selfe borne to the shore in the armes of a Knight. Thence with thirty sixe Ladies, all their Palfreis trapped in crimson Veluet, embroidered with gold, her selfe all in Cloth of siluer, her Horses and Chariots in Tissue-cloth of Gold and Crimson Veluet, set with Goldsmiths worke, more like an Angell then a humane Creature, met with King Lewis at Abuile, and there the ninth of October the marriage was solemnized; where the French so gazed at their new Queenes beauty, as they could not cast their eies from her attractiue rayes, nor the infirme King bee satisfied with any other obiect whilest she was in presence; for (so saith Guicchardine) he gaue himselfe ouer too much to behold her most excellent beauty, not considering her young yeares, being not yet eighteene, with the vnequality of his owne expired; nor the constitution of his weake decayed body. For hauing been sicke before this his marriage, and not well recouered of his lingring disease, (though he set the fairest shew outward) liued with this his faire Queene only eighty two daies, and then by his death left her to choose another Husband, to her best liking, which she shortly did in her second match.

(22) For, thus left a stranger in the French Court, and desirous to turne againe into England; King Henry her brother, sent Charles Brandon the new made Duke of Suffolke, to conduct the young Queene out of France. This Duke a gallant, and of a goodly presence, so courted his charge, and cartied himselfe in the eye of her melting affections, as his loue entred deepely into her tender heart: which thing indeed King Henry perceiued before, for which cause, as was thought, he raised him to the grace of a Duke; howsoeuer the Gemme thus got, and too precious to bee lost, he made her his owne, by celebration of marriage before he past Callis, and thence sent to intreate his Soueraignes consent, who seeing it was bootlesse to vndoe what was done, with a light touch of reproofe allowed their nuptials. But her dowry kept backe by the French, and other grieuances complained of, caused no little troubles betweene the two Realmes, as shall be related in place conuenient. In the meane while, let it not seeme ouer-tedious if we (somewhat extrauigant and briefly) runne ouer the rising and height of Thomas Wolsey, that great Statesman and Pontificall Priest, seeing that many dependances of Story had their euents in the Acts of this man, who with the King together went as King, if not before him in managing the State.

(23) His birth was at Ipswich in the County of Suffolke, his Parents poore, but of an honest report, and himselfe a good Philosopher, very eloquent and full of wit. His education in youth was at Oxford in Maudlin Colledge, and his first preferment from the Lord Marquesse Dorset, who bestowed vpon him a Benefice in his gift, in regard that hee was Tutor vnto his Sonnes; which Sir Amias Paulet so crost him in, that hee tyed Wolsey by the feete in the Stockes, though afterward hee put this his Act among other his deeds, whereof he had iust cause to repent: for the Schoolemaster no sooner was mounted into the Chancellor-

(25) But warres hauing beene commenced betwixt England and France, and Tournay loſt from the obedience of Lewis, King Henry gaue his Almoner the Biſhopricke thereof, and changed his Deanry of Lincolne into the Biſhopricke of the ſame Dioceſſe, and not long after ſet alſo the Miter of Yorke vpon Wolſeyes Wiſe-head: whereby he became (as it were) three Biſhops at once, and now being Primas Angliæ, carried himſelfe accordingly, by erecting his Croſſe in the Kings Court, albeit it were within the Iuriſdiction of Canterbury, which ſeemed vnſufferable; for the dignity of the Church held then much by Precedency of place, and the giuing way to inferiours, was accounted the infringing of all religious liberties; Wherfore William Archbiſhop of Canterbury found himſelfe ſore agreeued to haue the Croſſe of Yorke (which owed him obedience) aduanced with his, and that in his preſence, for which he greatly checked the preſumption of this proud Prelate.

(26) But Wolſey not wanting wherewithall to mate him, by the inſtigations of the Kings, both of England and France; obtained to be made Prieſt, Cardinall, and Legatus de Latere, vnto whom Pope Leo ſent a Cardinals Hat, with Bulls of authority in that behalfe; yet were theſe high Preſents brought in no better a caſe, then in a meane budget, which ſeemeth ſomewhat diſgracefull in the new Cardinals eye; wherefore he commanded a ſtay to be made of the bringers approach; and for the greater honour to this honourable preſent, arrayed him in moſt coſtly ſilkes, beſeeming ſo great an Ambaſſador, who aduancing forward, he cauſed to be encountred by a number of gallant Gentlemen, and a great aſſembly of Prelates, vpon Blacke-heath, by whom he was conducted with much honour through the City of London, and his Preſent deliuered at Weſtminſter, attended by many mytred Biſhops and Abbots, with a rich ſhew of Copes, as if it had beene a Kings Coronation.

To the better maintenance of his chargeable eſtate, the King beſtowed on him the Biſhopricke of Wincheſter, and in Commendam the Abbey of Saint Albanes, and with them he held in Farme the Biſhoprickes of Bathe, Worceſter, and Hereford, enioyed by ſtrangers incumbents, not reſiding in the Realme, ſo that now ſeeming a monſter with ſeauen heads, and each of them crowned with the Miter of a Biſhop; let vs thus leaue him dandled in Dame Fortunes lap, till ſurfeited with dalliance ſhee caſt him from thence.

(28) But the ſtate of Londons Tradeſ-men proſpered vnder his greatneſſe nothing ſo well, for ſuch was the concourſe of ſtrangers, and ſo much were they borne with, by the ſuperiours, that they abuſed the Engliſh openly in the markets, kept from a Citizen his owne wife, with his plate, yea, and paſt with a ſmall pennance for killing an Engliſh-man. Theſe firſt were complained of in a Sermon at Saint Maries Spittle, and afterwards aſſaulted, and much hurt done to their ſubſtance and houſes, for which riotous offence Iohn Lincolne the onely inſtigator was hanged; and foure hundred men, boyes, and eleauen women led in ropes along the City in their ſhirts, and halters about the neckes, to the Kings Hall at Weſtminſter, where his Maieſty ſitting vnder a cloth of eſtate, pardoned the offences, to the great reioycing of the Londoners.

(30) But peace much affected among Chriſtian Princes, and daily increaſed of moſt potent Eſtates, was very much feared would worke alteration in the authority, abuſe, and great riches of the Clergy, if Kings might haue leaſure to looke into their owne charges at home. To buſie their heads therefore from all ſuſpition or iealouſies, Pope Leo the tenth deuiſed the meanes, by a preparation intended for the Holy lands warres; a ſubiect in ſhew very religious, howſoeuer the former ſucceſſes had proued it not pleaſing to God, when to recouer the City once holy, and to build vp that which Chriſt by propheſie had caſt downe, as much Chriſtian bloud was ſpilt to raze thoſe ruinous wals, as there was morter laid to faſten the ſtones of their firſt building.

(32) Eight Mules he had laden with necessaries belonging, but those made no shew in proud Wolseys eyes, therefore twelue more he sent him to furnish his Pageants through the streets of London; these either wanton, or ashamed to be wondred at, played the skittish Iades indeed: For in Cheape-side, as this Triumph forth-passed, these Beasts by breaking their Collers, and escaping their Leaders, cast their Carriages and Coffers vpon the cold ground; whose lids flying open, layd most of their riches to the sight of the people. For, from some of them fell olde Breeches, Bootes, and broken shooes; from others, torne stockings, tottered ragges, old Iron and horse-shooes; and for fainting by the way, therein was bestowed, and now cast abroad, broken meate, mary-bones, rosted egges, and crusts of bread, ywisse worth the keeping; this Shipwracke made vpon the Shelues of Cheape-side, no need it was to bid the Muliters to bestirre them, who like good thrifty Marriners saued from spoyle as much as they could, and trussing vp their trinkets, laded againe these wantons, with the wealth of the Cardinall, who (good man) was iogging on afore with his Crosses, Pillars, Gilt-axe and Mace, vnto Pauls Church, where he was met with many mitred Bishops, and attended vpon to Bathe place, where we will leaue him, & returne to the place where wee left.

(33) The vnity agreed vpon betwixt England and France, a meeting was motioned for the two Kings, and to that end great preparation made aswell of the one, as of the other. But in the heat of this businesse, King Henry had word that Charles, his Queenes Nephew, and new-made Emperour, would visit him in England, which accordingly hee did, accompanied with the Queene of Arragon, and a most Royall Traine, and was as royally entertained by King Henry: the cause of his comming was to hinder the peace concluded with France, for although this Emperour was young, and but newly established; yet was hee wise, and well fore-saw the hurt that this amity with France would bring him, and therefore came in person of purpose to disswade the Kings minde, and to stay his entrance with the French if he could, but finding Henry so forward in those proceeds, he baited his hookes with golden gifts to the Cardinall, that might doe all with the King, and wanne him wholly to his deuotion.

(36) Then was it thought best by the Cardinals aduice to repay like with like, and therefore counselled his King to reare Charles Duke of Burbon against France, and to perswade him to inuade the very heart thereof, incouraging him with sufficient pay, and making him his Champion-generall of the Field; whilest the Emperour likewise held him play against Millan. And to that end was sent in way of loane to the Emperour a great summe of money, and forraigne Princes sollicited to take Armes against France, for effecting which, King Henry sent his Ambassadours to the States of Venice and Swissers, with these instructions as followeth.

Taken out of the Cardinals owne Letters, dated Ianuary 16. Anno. 1524.

Duke Burbon made King Henries Captaine Generall.

(37) That whereas in a treaty of peace it was concluded betwixt the Emperour, King Henry, and Francis the French King, that if any Controuersies should arise betwixt any two, the Prince not inuading should giue ayd and assistance against the inuader: but now the Emperour being inuaded by the French Kings Captaines in the Realme of Nauarre, and in his owne Countrey by Robert de la March, and others by his procurement, and our King (said they) being often called vpon by the Emperour, hath often entreated the French King to surcease, but hath nothing obtained, besides faire words and detraction of promises. Complaining likewise that in the intercourse of these businesses, the French King, contrary to his Oath, had sent the Duke of Albany into Scotland (in contempt of King Henry) and to the great danger of the young Kings death or deposition, hee being the next in bloud to succeed, and to the dishonour of the Queene-Mother, had caused a separation betwixt her and her lawfull Husband the Earle of Angus. That the French King had detained the paiment compounded for the deliuery of Tournay; and kept backe the dowry of his Sister Queene Dowager of France, that hee had entertained the rebellious Subiects of King Henry, and spoyled his Merchants both by Land and Sea. Neither was vnremembred the danger that the Venetians stood in, if the Realmes of Naples, and Sicilie, the Seigniories of Ieanes, and Millane were lost from the Empire. These therefore seemed faire proiects vnto King Henry for him to warre against France, and to that end a generall Muster by Commission was taken of all able men from sixteene yeares and vpward, of euery Hamlet, Village, Burrough, City, Hundred, and Shire, throughout England, which seemed to many another Domesday-Booke: and yet was there neither peace nor warre against France.

But with what acceptance his Holinesse receiued King Henries booke, his owne Oration solemnely made at the deliuery thereof vnto M. Iohn Clarke the presenter, and Kings Ambassador, in his Consistory, and in the presence of his Cardinals, sufficiently doth shew, the translation whereof we haue inserted as we finde it in the Originall it selfe.

The Popes Oration at the deliuery of K. Henries Booke. Ex Original.

"We doe receiue this booke with all alacrity: it is "indeed such as there could not be any thing sent vs, "and our venerable Brethren, more acceptable then it "is. For the King himselfe, a most mighty, most pru-"dent, and most truely Christian Prince, wee know "not whether we may more praise or admire, being "the first that by war, with happy successe, hath sub-"dued the enemies of the Church of Christ, that seeke "to rend Christs coat, and at last ouercomming the "enemies, hath restored peace to the Church of God, "and to this holy See. But now against so foule a Mon-"ster, both to vnderstand, to be able, and willing to "write this booke, he hath shewed himselfe no more "admirable to the whole world for his elegant style, "then for his wit. We humbly giue thankes to our "Creator, for giuing such a Prince to defend his "Church, and this holy See, desiring the same God to "grant to this his King a happy life, & all his desires, "and after this life in his heauenly Kingdome, to keep "for him an euerlasting Crowne. And we so farre as "we are able to entreat of God, will neuer be wanting "to the said most wise King in the faculties granted "to vs of God.

(40) To manifest which his readinesse, himselfe among his Cardinals decreed an augmentation vnto King Henries royall Style, to be annexed vnto his others; confirming the same by his Bull, which that it perish not by the deuouring teeth of Time, wee haue here published from the originall Parchment, and Leaden seale it selfe, as followeth.

(41) Leo Episcopus, seruus seruorum Dei, &c. Leo Bishop, seruant of the seruants of God; To our most dearely beloued Sonne in Christ, Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, health and Apostolicall Benediction. We by diuine permission, the cheife ouerseer for the gouernment of the vniuersall Church, though vnsufficient for so great a worke, doe powre forth the cogitations of our heart, that the Catholike faith, without which no man can attaine to saluation, may receiue continuall increase, and that those good lawes and constitutions decreed by the wisedome and learning of such as are in authority, especially the faithfull in Christ, for restraining the attempts of all that labour to oppresse the same, or by wicked lyes and fictions seeke to peruert and obscure it, may prosper with perpetuall increase, doe bestow our paines and vtmost endeauour in our office and Ministery. And like as the Romane Bishops our predecessors, were woont to shew especiall fauour to Catholike Princes (according as the quality of matters and times required) especially to them that in troublesome times, when the madnesse and perfidious dealing of Schismatikes and heretikes most of all abound, did abide constant and vnmoueable, not onely in soundnesse of faith and pure deuotion to the holy Romane Church, but also as the most legitimate sonnes and valiant Champions of the same, opposed themselues both with mind and body against the furious madnesse of Schismatikes & heretikes: so likewise also doe we desire to extoll your Maiesty with worthy and immortall praises, for your high and immortall deserts and labours towards vs, and this holy See, wherein by Gods permission wee sit, to grant vnto it those things for which it ought to watch, and driue away the Wolues from the Lords flocke, and to cut off with the materiall sword rotten members, which infect the mysticall body of Christ, and to confirme the hearts of the faithfull in soundnesse of beliefe. Now, where of late our beloued sonne Iohn Clarke your Maiesties Orator with vs, being in our Consistory before our venerable Brethren of the holy Romane Church, the Cardinals and many other Prelates of the same, exhibited a Booke vnto vs to be examined and allowed of vs, which Booke your Maiesties selfe (who doth all things with diligence, and nothing amisse) enflamed with charity and zeale to the Catholike faith, and with ardent deuotion toward vs, and this holy See, hath composed, as a most worthy and soueraigne Antidote against the errors of diuers heretikes, often condemned by this holy See, and of late stirred vp and brought in by Martin Luther: And your said Orator hath also largely declared vnto vs, that your Maiesty is ready, and purposeth, like as you haue confuted the notorious errors of the said Martin, by true reason and inuincible authorities of sacred Scripture, and ancient Fathers, so you will punish to the vttermost of your power, all those of your whole Kingdome, that shall presume to follow, or defend them: and we haue diligently and exactly perused and viewed the admirable doctrine of your said Booke, watered with the deaw of heauenly grace, and doe heartily thanke Almighty God, from whom euery good & perfect gift doth come, who hath vouchsafed to inspire your Noble mind, inclined to euery good thing, and to endue you with so great grace from heauen, as to write those things, whereby you are able to defend his holy faith, against such a new Innouator of damned errors; and also incite by your example all other Christian Kings and Princes, to be willing to fauour and further with all their best aydes the Orthodoxall faith, and Euangelicall truth, whensoeuer it be brought into danger or doubt. And wee thinke it also meete, that they who haue vndertaken such godly labours for the defence of the faith of Christ, should haue all praise & honour of vs; and wee are desirous, that not only the things themselues which your Maiestie hath written, being both of most sound doctrine, and no lesse eloquence, should be extolled and magnified with condigne commendations, and allowed and confirmed by our authority; but also, that your Maiesty should bee graced with such an honour, and such a Title, as that both for our time, and euer hereafter, all men might perceiue how gratefull and acceptable this gift of your Maiesties hath beene vnto vs, especially offered vnto vs now at this time. Wee, who be the true successors of Peter, whom Christ at his ascension into heauen left his Vicar on earth, & to whom he committed the care of his flocke: We, I say, who sit in this holy seate, from which all dignities and titles doe flow, vpon mature deliberation had with our said Brethren about these things, haue by the generall agreement and consent of them decreed, to bestow vpon your Maiesty this Title, namely, THE DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And accordingly by these presents doe instile you with such a title, commanding all faithfull Christians that they name your Maiestie with this Title, and when they write to you, that after the word KING, they adioyne DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And truely, we diligently considering and weighing your singular merits, were not able to bethinke vs of a name more worthy and conuenient for your Maiestie, then the excellency and dignity of this Title, which so often as you shall heare and reade, so often you may call to minde this your singular vertue and great desert; nor may you by this Title puffe vp your selfe in pride, but according to your wonted prudence become more humble, and bee more valiant and constant in the faith of Christ, and in deuotion to this holy See, by which you haue beene exalted, reioycing in the Lord the giuer of all good things, leauing this as a perpetuall and immortall monument of your glory to your children, shewing them the way vnto the like, that if they shall desire to be graced also with such a Title, they must labour to doe such workes, and to follow the excellent ſteps of your Maieſtie, whom, accordingly as you haue well deſerued of vs, and this ſaid See, together with your wife, and all your Children that ſhall be borne of you, or of them, we bleſſe with our Benediction, with a large and liberall hand, in the name of H I M, from whom the power of granting this bleſſing is giuen vnto vs, praying and beſeeching that Almighty One, who ſaith, By me Kings raigne, and Princes rule, and in whoſe hands are the hearts of Kings, that hee will confirme your Maieſty in your holy purpoſe, and encreaſe your deuotion, and by your worthy endeauours for the ſacred faith, ſo to illuſtrate your renowne, and make you glorious through all the world, that this our Teſtimony which wee haue giuen of you, adorning you with ſo excellent a Title, may neuer be iudged by any to be falſe or vaine. Laſtly, we deſire God, that after this life ended, he would make you partakers of his eternall glory. Giuen at Rome at Saint Peters, in the yeare of the Incarnation of our Lord God, 1521. the fift Ides of October, the ninth yeare of our Papacie.

(42) But from theſe Prieſtly and Papall gratulations, let vs returne to leade our Story vnto temporall Princes affaires. How the Emperour Charles had beene entertained in King Henries Court, wee haue ſaid, and now ready to depart with many rich gifts, hee repaired to Southampton, where hee tooke his Ships for Spaine, whoſe conductor through the narrow Seas was Thomas Earle of Surrey, Lord high Admirall of England, who hauing wafted him vnto Biſcay, with a gallant crew of Gentlemen, made thence ſaile into France, and in Britaine beſieged and wonne the ſtrong Towne Morleis, and with the Garriſon Souldiers of the Marches daily bickered with the heart-burning French, and daily went away with the better, but new ſtirres arreared by the Scots, the Lord Admirall was recalled, and came to the Court, where he declared to his Highneſſe what hee had done in Britaine.

The Emperour departeth England.

The L. Admirall winneth Morleys.

(43) King Henries buſineſſe thus on foot in France, hee thought to purſue it with all the aduantage hee could, and firſt to finde the Scots play, who were euer faſt friends to the French, he ſent the Lords Roſſe and Dacres to ſecure the North-borders, appoynting for his Lieutenant in thoſe parts the Earle of Shrewsbury, and ſent the Lord Admirall of England againe into France, who diuided his Army into three Battalions; the firſt whereof, was led by Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater; the Middle, the Earle conducted himſelfe, with the aſſiſtance of his Brother Lord Edmund Howard; and the Rereward was gouerned by Sir William Sands, and Sir Richard Wingfield, both of them Knights of the Order, the Colonell of the horſe was Sir Edward Guilford.

(44) Theſe in September entred into the French Pale, and made toward the Caſtell of Heding, vnto whom ioyned the Burgundians, ſent from the Lady Margaret then Regent of Flanders, vnder whoſe colours ſerued many Spaniards; Surrey thus ſet forward, burned all things where he came, demoliſhing the Caſtles and Townes of Sellios, Brumbridge, Senekerk, Botingham, Manſtier, Nerbins, Dauerne, Culumberge and Fringes the Towne and Churches fortified of Boards, Vaus, and Saint Mary de Bois: but laying his ſiege againſt Heding, was forced for want of battering peeces, to breake vp againe, and depart: In whoſe returne he burnt the Townes and Caſtles of Dorlens and Darrier, and comming to Callis, ſet ſaile for England with a wonderfull great Booty.

(45) In this while the Duke of Albanie being made Gouernour of Scotland, with an Army of foureſcore thouſand drew vnto the Borders, whence he ſent into France for ſixe thouſand Almains, which were promiſed, and daily expected though in vaine, for none came at all. The Earle of Shrewsbury with eight and twenty thouſand ſtrong, drew likewiſe towards the Borders, but the Scots lying ſtill, without further inuaſion, an abſtinence from warre was betwixt them concluded, which how the Engliſh kept, the ſequell well ſhewed; for the King ordaining Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the whole Marches, hee either refrained to impeach his honour by breach of truce, or elſe loath to be diſquieted of his ſoft reſt, made meanes to the King, to be diſcharged of the office, which was forthwith beſtowed (and thankefully accepted) vpon Thomas Earle of Surrey, lately returned out of France, who deliuered the charge of the Eaſt and Middle-Marches vnto the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet, and the Weſt vnto the Lord Dacres, who preſently made a roade into Scotland, and returned with booty.

(46) France and Scotland thus aſſailed at once, a Parliament was aſſembled at Blacke-Fryers in London, wherein Cardinall Wolſey moued, and with much adoe obtained, the halfe of the yearely reuenewes of all ſpirituall liuings, to be payd for fiue yeares continuance, and the tenth part of all temporall ſubſtance to maintaine this great charge of the King, for the exact collection whereof the Cardinall was ſo forward, as he moued, and would haue had euery man ſworne for his wealth, had not the Citizens of London vtterly refuſed it, which when the King heard of, he was highly diſpleaſed with Wolſey, and ſaid, that ere long he would looke to things himſelfe without any Subſtitute.

A great Subſidy granted.

(47) Among other great eſteeme of this magnanimous Monarch, it was not the leaſt that the Emperour in perſon had twice come into England to viſite him, and euen at this time, Chriſtian King of Denmarke with his Queene, vnto whom Queene Katherine was Aunt, landed at Douer, and was honourably brought vnto London, where they were royally feaſted, and after two and twenty dayes intertainement, receiuing great gifts of the King and Queene, they returned to Flanders, where he remained as a baniſhed man out of his owne Countrey.

The King and Queene of Denmarke came into England.

(48) King Henry purpoſing his further purſuits, ſent a great Army into France, vnder the leading of the Duke of Suffolke Charles Brandon, attended vpon by the Lords Montacute, Herbert, Ferrers, Marney, Sands, Barkley and Powis, nineteene Knights, ſix hundred demi-Lances, two hundred Archers horſed, three thouſand more of them on foot, fiue thouſand Bill-men, and ſeauenteene hundred Garriſon Souldiers, with one thouſand fiue hundred labourers and Pioners. Theſe departing Callis, firſt beſieged, and wanne Bell-Caſtell, and then entring Picardy, there ioyned vnto him three thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe of Almans and Spaniards; with theſe hee aſſailed, and tooke the Caſtell of Bounegard, wherein hee put Garriſon, wanne Braye, Roie, Lihome, Montdedier and Boghan: but the winter come on, and the weather extreame in wets and froſts, beſides other wants euer following the Winters Warriers, the Duke was enforced to breake vp Campe; and from Callis came ſafely to the Court, where, vnto King Henry hee was very welcome, but much more vnto the French Queene his Wife.

(49) The Scottiſh (as we haue ſaid) keeping the Borders, and the Engliſh making inroades, where the places were weakeſt, the ſtirres betwixt them began daily to increaſe. In ſo much as the Duke of Albany ſent a Herauld vnto the Earle of Surrey, the Kings Lieutenant of the North, to offer him Battell, promiſing on his honour if hee tooke him Priſoner, his ranſome ſhould be eaſie, and his perſon courteouſly dealt with; who returned as rough an anſwere, as the offer was kinde, saying, he would abide Battell if he durst giue it, & if the Duke were taken either by him or his, he would strike off his head and send it for a present to his Master the King of England. So netled was the Earle against the French, that had raised Albany thus against England, and King Henry (as Bishop Lesly reporteth) tooke from the Scots inhabiting England all their goods, sending them into their Countrey on foote, with white Crosses sewed vpon their vppermost Garments, by which they were knowne and suffered to passe. The Scots vpon the Earles answere were wonderfully enraged, and seeking the reuenge, some of them passed ouer the water, and hotly besieged the Castell of Warke, which the Englishmen as valiantly defended, and in their resistance slew almost three hundred of their French Souldiers, the Scots retyring againe to their Campe.

(50) The Regent not able to digest the Earles pill, commanded his Army to march forward into the English Marches, wherewith the common Souldiers much reioyced, but the wiser of the Nobility vrged this in their Counsell, that hauing displayed in warlike manner, their Banners vpon the Verge of the Borders, and defended their Countrey from the spoile, they saw no great reason further to proceed, no necessity or cause mouing, besides the quarrell of the French: and thereupon repayring to the Regent, they demanded why they should proceed further, alleadging that at his commandement (yea and that willingly) they had so farre passed, for the defence of their Countrey, which was sufficient without further inuasion of the others, the time so vnconuenient in the nonage of their young King, and the action so dangerous, wherein all the Peeres of Scotland were assembled, to attend and suffer the doubtfull issue of warre, which euer is vncertaine, and more losse in one battell many times suffered, then gaine can be gotten in many: whereof too too lamentable experience (said they) wee haue had by King Iames, that by peace and life, brought Scotland to her best, but by his warre and death almost to the worst, therefore would wee know (said the Nobility) whether this your intent stands with the weale of the King and vs, or else is prosecuted in the cause of your selfe and the French?

Bishop Lesly.

The Scottish Nobility expostulateth with the Regent.

More lost by war, then gotten by victory.

(51) The Duke making some pause, lastly replyed, and said; "This question would haue beene "demanded ere now: for well you know, that from "Scotland I beare my name, honour and lineage, "haue passed the Seas from the noble Realme of "France for the loue of my Countrey, to set you in "amity which were at dissention, by whose diuision "your Realme lay prostrate to destruction and Con"quest, for whose ayde you see I haue procured the "French to ioyne with you against the English. A"gaine, when these warres were determined by Par"liament, you made me your Captaine, authorizing "me to inuade England with Banner displayed, then "was no question or demand of the cause; neither "haue I entred the quarrell without your agree"ment; and therefore may I iustifie my present do"ings, and yet to me it seemeth there is cause sufficient, with fire, sword and bloud, to enter England, "if wee be not too forgetfull, and will submit our "selues to dishonour and reproach: for we all know "that the Realme of Scotland is ours by inheri"tance, and that portion of the world allowed to "our Nation to enioy; how can we warre better, "then to maintaine our naturall inheritance, against "which the English giue daily attempts, with man"slaughter, murthers, thefts and spoyles? haue we not "then (thinke you) iust cause to make warre? The de"fence of a kingdome, is the office of a King, the ho"nour of the Noble, the seruice of the Souldier, and "the duty of a naturall Subiect. But be it as you "will, yet hauing so puissant an army to auoide our "owne reproach, and encouragement of the Ene"mie, let vs campe here still on the Borders till we "see what the Englishmen intend.

The Duke of Albanies answer.

(52) But Margaret Queene of Scots solliciting her brother for a peace, these stirres brake vp for a time, as those in France did shortly after, by the working wit of Cardinall Wolsey, who in the State affaires was euer one, which made him the more emulated, and the grieuances of the Commons euer cast vpon him; in so much that it was commonly spoken hee was the causer of the heauy imposition granted to maintaine the Kings warres, which was so importable to the poorer sort of Subiects, as the payment thereof was vtterly denyed to the appoynted Collectors, with weepings, cursings, and great acclamations; yea, and almost grew to an open Rebellion: for Kent denied it to the Lord Cobham: Essex refused to commune with the Commissioners: Huntingtonshire resisted, and would not heare them: London would be taxt by none but by their Aldermen: and Suffolke rose vp in Armes, making Pouerty their Captaine. Of these stirres when King Henry heard, hee had great indignation, blaming the Counsellors, and wrote his Letters vnto euery County, that no such demands should be payd: and the Cardinal to curry-fauour with the Commons gaue it forth forsooth, that at his intercession the Offenders were pardoned, and the money remitted.

(53) And now more to shew his owne power, then any great cause; hee beganne to alienate the heart of King Henry against his Nephew the Emperour, and caused him to with-hold pay from the Duke of Burbon his late made Generall: which was the cause of the French Kings Captiuity. For Burbon incamped within the Towne of Pauia, and besieged by the French in most warlike manner, was for want of his said pay so desperate of life, that he attempted a most dangerous escape. In the dead of the night he set a part of his company to assaile the enemy on that side of the Towne which was least strong, himselfe issuing secretly out of a Posterne on the contrary side. The watch but slender, and the Souldiers asleepe, a great terror arose, in which the besiegers turned their Ordnance to the place of the crye, when as suddenly Burbon was at their backes, and winning their Ordnance, discharged them against their owners, slew their Souldiers, cut downe their Tents, and by the Vice-roye of Naples was the French King taken prisoner in the field.

(54) This fortunate successe made these Almaines more bolde, who presently with the Imperiall Ensignes marched towards Florence, and thence to Rome, vnto whose walls in one day they gaue three assaults, in the last whereof Charles Duke of Burbon their Generall was slaine; notwithstanding the City was taken and sacked; Pope Clement in the meane while, to make all sure as he thought, thundred out his Curses, and with Bell, Booke and Candle, committed those Lutherans to Hell; who neuertheless broke drown that windy Bulwarke, and with great slaughter forced him with twenty three Cardinals, into the Castell of Saint Angello, where they kept them besieged from the sixt of May, vnto the tenth of December: in which time, in mockage of the Pope, the Souldiers to make solace did often apparell one in Pontificall attire, who sometime should blesse them, and sometime accurse them, and riding on Horse backe with a Whore set behinde him, should so passe the streets, that the Pope & Cardinals might see him. These contumelies and Papall Captiuities were grieuously taken by many Christian Princes, insomuch that Cæsar in Spaine forbad all Enterludes to be playde, and Pageants prepared for ioy of the birth of his Sonne, Prince Philip, to be pulled downe. In France by the Court of Parliament the Duke of Burbon was condemned of Treason, his name and memoriall accursed, his Armes puld downe, and his Lands and goods confiscated; neither would King Henrie of England answere the Emperours Letters, wherein he excused himselfe from hauing any hand in the action.

Troubles in Ireland.

(55) Whileſt theſe things were in working at Rome, aroſe great troubles in Ireland, the Kerns caſting off all obedience, and killing the Kings ſubiects where they found them: againſt whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdome, made forth his power, and followed them himſelfe with ſuch danger of life, that the viſor of his Helmet was ſhot off, as hee purſued the enemy through the deſert woods: but theſe Rebels cut off by his high valour, and warres proclaimed at one time againſt Scotland and France, the Lord Lieutenant was recalled into England; and Piers Butler Earle of Oſorie made Deputy of Ireland in his ſtead; betwixt whom, and Girald Fitz-Girald Earle of Kildare, whoſe ſiſter hee had married, aroſe no little ſtrife and debate, which grew to that height as King Henry ſent Commiſſioners to trie and examine the differences, which was ſo cleared on Kildares behalfe, that Oſorie was diſcharged of his Office, and the Lord Fitz-Girald ſworne Deputy in his place; whereat Cardinal Wolſey (whoſe hand chiefly ſteered all ſtates affaires, a deadly enemy to the Earle of Kildare) was highly offended, and to vndermine the foundations of this his new Gouernment, gaue eare vnto Oſorie, who accuſed the new Deputy of many miſdemeanours, among which theſe were the principall; that he winked at Deſmonds eſcape, whom he ſhould haue attached by order from the King: that he grew ouer-familiar with the natiue Iriſh; and that he put to death the Kings beſt Subiects: for theſe the Lord Deputy was commaunded into England, in whoſe abſence Oſorie, his enemy, was againe choſen Lord Deputy by the Kings Counſell, but himſelfe none of the wiſeſt for pollitike Gouernment, was altogether therein ruled by his Wife, and ſhe made it no courteſie to abuſe her Husbands honour againſt her naturall brother Kildare, who now in England muſt anſwere his demeanour before the Lords of the Counſell, and to their Table was he brought, where the Cardinall, Lord Chancellor, made his faults nothing leſſe, and thus addreſſed himſelfe againſt the Earle of Kildare.

" (56) I wot well (my Lord) that I am not the "meeteſt at this boord to charge you with theſe "treaſons, becauſe it hath pleaſed ſome of your "Pew-fellowes to report, that I am a profeſſed ene-"my to all Nobility, and namely to the Giraldines: "but ſeeing euery ſhrewd boy can ſay as much when "he is controuled, and theſe points ſo weighty, that "they ſhould not be diſſembled of vs; and ſo appa-"rant that they cannot be denied of you: I muſt "haue leaue (notwithſtanding your ſtale ſlander) to "bee the mouth of theſe honourable Lords at this "preſent, and to trumpe your treaſons in your way, "howſoeuer you take me. Firſt you remember, how "the lewd Earle of Deſmond your kinſeman (who "paſſeth not whom he ſerueth might he change his "Maſter) ſent his Confederates with Letters of cre-"dence vnto Francis the French King: and hauing "but cold comfort there, went to Charles the Em-"perour, proffering the helpe of Mounſter, and Co-"naught, towards the Conqueſt of Ireland, if either "of them would helpe to win it from our King. How "many Letters, what precepts, what meſſages, what "threats, haue beene ſent you to apprehend him, "and yet not done? Why ſo? Forſooth I could not "catch him? Nay, nay Earle, forſooth you would "not watch him: If hee be iuſtly ſuſpected, why "are you partiall in ſo great a charge? If not, why "are you fearefull to haue him tryed? Yea, for it "will be ſworne and depoſed to your face, that for "feare of meeting him, you haue winked wilfully, "ſhunned his ſight, altered your courſe, warned "your friends, ſtopped both eares and eies, againſt "his detectors, and whenſoeuer you tooke vpon you "to hunt him out, then was he ſure afore-hand to be "out of your walke. Surely, this iugling and falſe "play, little became either an honeſt man, called to "ſuch honour, or a Nobleman put in ſo great truſt: "had you loſt but a Cow or a Horſe of your owne, "two hundred of your retainers would haue come "at your Whiſtle to reſcue the prey from the vtter-"moſt edge of Vlſter: all the Iriſh in Ireland muſt "haue giuen you the way. One while he is from home, and another "while he keepeth home, ſometimes fled, ſometimes "in the Borders, where you dare not venture. Y-"wiſſe, my Lord, there be ſhrwd bugges in the bor-"ders, for the Earle of Kildare to feare; the Earle, "nay the King of Kildare: for when you are diſpo-"ſed, you raigne more like, then rule in the Land: "where you are pleaſed, the Iriſh foe ſtandeth for a "iuſt Subiect: hearts and hands, liues and lands "are all at your courteſie: who fawneth not thereon, "cannot reſt within your ſmell, and your ſmell ſo "rancke, that you track them out at pleaſure. Whileſt the Cardinall was ſpeaking, the Earle chafed and changed colour, & at laſt brake out, and interrupted him thus.

The Lords tender Kildare.

" (58) That granted: It is good reaſon (quoth the "Earle) that your Grace beare the mouth of this "boord: but my Lord, thoſe mouthes that put theſe "things into your mouth, are very wide mouthes: "ſuch indeed as haue gaped long for my wracke: "and now at length for want of better ſtuffe, are "faine to fill their mouthes with ſmoake: what my "Coſen Deſmond hath compaſſed, as I know not, ſo "I beſhrew his nacked heart for holding out ſo long. In what case stand the Noblemen of Ireland with Rebels.

At these girds the Lord Chancellor much fretted, and finding Kildare to be no Babe, deferred the hearing of his cause, till more proofes were produced from Ireland; then in a great fume he arose from the Counsell board, and committed the Earle vnto prison, against the minds of most at the Table, who knew well, that this his accusation was more of hatred borne by the Cardinall, then any occasion giuen by the accused late Deputy. Whereupon Thomas Duke of Norfolke stept to the King, and craued that Kildare might be his Prisoner, offering to be bound in goods and body for his forth-comming, whom he obtayned, though with no great liking of the Lord Chancellor, who daily entertained new plaints against him, till at last he pressed him sore with letters sent to Oneale and Oconor, to encourage their rebellions against Osorie the Lord Deputy; which letters were brought them by his own daughter and their sisters, the Lady Elice Fitz-Girald wife to the Baron of Slane.

Kildare accused for suborning of Traitors.

(59) This presumption being vehement, the King suspitious, the Cardinall eager, and his friends faint, Kildare was sent to the Tower, where he committed himselfe to GOD, and expected daily his death, but with such couragious resolution, as he being in play with the Lieutenant at slide-groat, when the Mandate was brought for his execution on the next Morning, and seeing the Lieutenant strucke into a suddaine sadnesse; by Saint Bride, Lieutenant (quoth the Earle) there is some madde game in that scrowll; but fall how it will, this throw is for a huddle: and when the worst was told him, now I pray thee (quoth hee) doe no more but learne assuredly from the Kings owne mouth, whether his Highnesse be witting thereto or no; the Lieutenant louing his prisoner well, repayred to the King, and shewed him the Cardinals warrant, who then controuled the sawcines of the Priest (for those were his tearmes) and gaue the Lieutenant his Signet for a counter-mand, whereat the Cardinall stormed, but Kildare deliuered from his eminent death, and not long after from his imprisonment also, was sent into Ireland, where, at his entrance into Dublin, he was met with a solemne procession, and so brought into the City; so well beloued was this Earle abroad, and at home.

(60) But the French Kings fortunes were nothing so good, who was straitly imprisoned at Madrill in Spaine, and great suite made for his deliuerance, which notwithstanding would not be heard. The Queene-mother, then Regent of France, wife of her selfe, and forwarded by others, saw no better meanes to free her sonne the King, then to enter amity with England, which to accomplish, shee solicited King Henry; working vpon the occasions then ministred, which was some vnkindnesse growne betwixt the English King, and the Emperour, the one of them more strange by the greatnesse of his fortunes, and the other in jealousie of lessening renowne. The sparkes of which Cinders were stirred to flame, by Wolsey, that euer was in the eare of the King: alleadging his potency, so much esteemed of all Christian Princes (a sound very tunable in Henries wide eare) would be lesse regarded by the Emperours late victory; who now began to carry himselfe with another respect, and neuer after that victory gotten subscribed his Letters to King Henry, according to his accustomed manner, Your Sonne and Cosen; but to the draught of his Secretaries, infixed his hand with the word Charles, and no more.

Dislikes betwixt the Emperour and King Henry.

(61) These dislikes and other intercourses of State, drew Henry shortly to a peace with France. In the exemplification of which league the Venetians, and other Princes were left to their choyse, whereof himselfe notwithstanding would be styled the Protector. And to his leaguer Ambassadours sent these instructions to moue the States to consider the Emperours aspired greatnesse, who now commanded the Kingdomes of Naples, and Sicilie; the Dutchie of Millan, the Seigniorie of Iean, the Countie of Ast, and other possessions in Italie, the whole Countrey of Germanie, being the greatest part of Christendome, already either totally in his possespossession, or facilly might be at his command, hauing likewise the lower parts thereof, as the Countries of Artoys, Flanders, Zeland, Holland, Brabant, Henault, and others; from the which also a direct passage lay vnto the Dutchie of Burgonie, Auerne, and Burbon, besides the Realmes of Castile, Arragon, Granate, Galice, Asturia, Perpynyon, Russinian, and other parts of Spaine; whereupon hee with some other Princes complayned, and sought the French Kings deliuerance, which when it was gotten, King Francis acknowledged Henry next vnder God to be the onely meanes: * but was so slacke in performance of Couenants, that when the Emperour sent to haue them accomplished, hee with vnprincely termes returned the answere, with challenge of combate, which when the Emperour had accepted, hee shrunke backe, and made meanes of a league.

* Sleidan. com. l. 6.

(62) But howsoeuer the vnconstancy of our king Henry hath beene blanched forth, for not holding himselfe in his leagues or couenants of amity with other Princes; yet the cause being so as some haue obserued, there were occasions giuen aswell as oportunity taken: for Charles the Emperour, contrary to couenant, receiued Grancetor a trayterous rebell, condemned by Parliament, whom hee refused to deliuer, though the King made earnest suit for the man. Moreouer, by his Ambassadors in a Treaty of perpetuall peace, holden at Windsor-Castell, the nineteenth of Iune, and foureteenth of King Henries raigne; it was concluded that Charles the Emperour should contract the young Princesse the Lady Mary, and take her to his wife, when shee came to able yeares, which (as Holinshead saith) himselfe sought, at his being in England, promising to remaine vnmarried, till that Princesse had past her Minority, and againe before the battell of Pauia, (shee now growne vnto sixe yeares of age) sent his Ambassadors to haue her stiled Empresse, and to be made Gouernesse of the low-Countries; all this notwithstanding after that victory against the French King, he began to re-call, and to make small account of that match, pretending the desire of his subiects to haue an heire of his body, which for long time he could not by Lady Mary; but rather as the English judged, the cause was the money receiued in loane from King Henry, whereby (as hee thought) the greatest part of her portion was already paide; and the Emperours wants being great, * Isabel the sister of Portugall was much affected: with whom plenty of gold was expected, and great liberality offered by the Emperials in desire to haue an Empresse of their owne Nation.

And for his falling off from the French King, these occasions may well be alleadged.

Lady Maries legitimation called in question.

(64) That whereas it had beene couenanted at the marriage of Lady Mary vnto King Lewis departed this life, one hundred thousand Crownes should be paid to King Henry, and thirtie two thousand Crownes yearely for her Dowry, during terme of life; both which notwithstanding were retained and kept backe vnpaide. 2. That the said French King had listned vnto Cardinall Poole, who was sent to him from the Pope to stirre warres against England. 3. That contrary to his Couenant hee had entred alliance with the House of Medicis, and had married his daughter Magdalen vnto Iames the fift King of Scotland, then an hostile enemy vnto King Henry. 4. That he had made suit to match his second sonne Henry Duke of Orleance, with Lady Mary, the onely then Heire apparant of England, which when it came to conclusion, was put in suspence by Anthonie Vescie one of his French Commissioners, who then made doubt whether the marriage of her mother being wife to the Kings owne brother, could be dispensed with, or the Children begot in this second bed legitimate, or by law allowed to succeed in the throne.

Objection of the French for Lady Maries legitimation.

(65) These considerations no doubt drew the King to be vnconstant to them that were vnconstant in themselues, and the question of Lady Maries legitimation serued such doubts in his melting conscience, as neuer after could be made sollid: whereof Doctor Longland, his Confessor, is said to be the first man which told the King that his marriage was vnlawfull, vnto whose opinion other great Clerkes did likewise consent; whereupon a rumour ran that the King would be diuorced from the Queene, and the occasion thereof altogether cast vpon the Cardinall of Yorke, in displeasure taken against the Emperour, vnto whom he had beene suiter for the Archbishopricke of Toledo; whereof failing, he reuenged his spleene vpon his innocent Aunt Queene Katherine, in mouing the King to cast her off, and to become Suiter vnto the Dutchesse of Alenzon, sister vnto the French King; these rumours King Henry himselfe forbad; but with no better successe then was the report of Queene Annes death, the wife of the Vsurper; both euents following before the mouthes of those relaters could be stopped; vnto which lamentable accident my penne must now enter.

King Henries marriage called in question.

(67) This match was made by King Henrie the seauenth, and Ferdinando of Spaine their Parents, Prince Henry hauing then attained but to ten yeares of age, and when hee came to foureteene, proscribed against it, as by a deed vnder his owne hand, I haue here inserted, the tenor thereof faithfully translated out of Latine, is thus as followeth.

In the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you reuerend Father and Lord in Christ, Lord Richard by the grace of God, and See Apostolicke, Bishop of Winchester. I Henry Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester doe say, affirme, and by these Writings declare; That although in the time of my Minority, and when I was vnder yeares of marriage, I absolutely contracted Matrimony with the most vertuous Lady Katherine, daughter of the King of Spaine, and although also the saide Contract by reason of my being vnder age, doth now appeare of it selfe insufficient, weake, and of no force, vigour, or efficacie: yet forasmuch as that now I come to perfect yeares, and that thereby the said Contract may peraduenture be thought and seeme, by silent consent, mutuall abode in one house, by giuing and receiuing gifts and tokens, or by any other way whatsoeuer, to be apparantly sufficient, and confirmed: Therefore I Henry Prince of Wales, doe heere protest, and make knowne to all men that I intend not to approue, ratifie, or confirme in any sort this pretended contract by any thing that I haue said or shall say, haue done, or shall doe: but doe at this present renounce the same, freely, and of mine owne accord, vnconstrayned either by force, fraud, entreaty, or any way else: and I deny it, and wholly purpose and intend quite to relinquish this pretended contract of Matrimony by the best wayes and meanes that by law more fully, effectually, and sufficiently I may or shall be able to doe: and expresly doe disauow the same, according as by these presents I doe disclaime it, and disauow it; and I protest that I nei-

Prince Henry disclaimed his contract.

I neyther will nor intend to consent vnto the saide Contract, or vnto the saide Lady Katherine as my espousall and wife, by any word, deede, act, or gesture to be spoken, done, performed, or acted by me, or in my name, by any whomsoeuer, whensoeuer, or howsoeuer for the time to come. In witnesse whereof I desire, require, entreate, and adjure you all to giue testimonie hereunto.

By me Henry Prince of Wales.

The aboue-written Protestation was read and made by the aforesaid Noble Prince Lord Henrie, in the presence of the reuerend Father and Lord in Christ, the Lord Richard, by diuine permission, Bishop of Winchester, sitting iudiciously in his Court; and I the Notary vnder-written, at that time present, the writer of his Acts in this behalfe appointed, and in the presence of the vnder-named witnesses, in the yeare of our Lord God 1505. the eight Indiction of the most holy See, of our father and Lord in Christ, by diuine prouidence Pope Iulius the second, in his second yeare, and 27. of the moneth of Iune, in which day the said worthy Prince was of perfect yeares of marriage, as then he did there affirme, in a certaine outward Court within the royall Palace of Richmond, situate in the West-part of the said Palace: Concerning all and singular which things, the aforesaid most noble Prince instantly required and entreated mee the aforesaid Notarie to frame an instrument, and likewise the witnesses vnder-written to giue testimony. In iustification of all and singular the premisses, the aforesaid Noble Prince hath superscribed his name; and the witnesses, as aforesaid entreated and required, haue subscribed their names, with their owne hands.

So it is as aboue said, which I Iohn Read doe witnesse by my hand and Seale.

The second protestation when he came to yeares of marriage.

Notwithstanding this prescription foure yeares after, and the first of his raigne, hee tooke the said Lady Katherine to wife; and without all exception enioyed her nuptial society the space almost of twenty yeares; in which time shee had borne him two sonnes, both of them in their infancy taken away by death, and one daughter, Lady Mary, growne now vnto tenne yeares of age. But the scruple of Conscience increasing more tender in the Kings breast, he first refused the Queenes bed; and then mouing the doubt vnto his owne Diuines, sent for the opinions of the most Vniuersities in Europe, as to Paris, Orleance, Bononie, Burges, Anion, Padua, Tholouze, Vincentia, Vauia, Foro, Iuly, and others, which howsoeuer they then stood for the Pope, and he allowing (by his Predecessors dispensation, whose doing could not erre) the Matrimonie lawfull, yet these Academickes concluded against it, and signified the contrary vnder most of their common Seales, as the relation of the Kings Agent imployed vpon the same purpose for that of Padua doth import, which writing vnder his owne hand I haue seene, and here will insert his words, as followeth:

The King refuseth the Queens bed.

Ex Manuscript.

Pleaseth it your Highnesse to be aduertised, that as this day I obtayned the Common Seale of the Vniuersity of Padua in substantiall and good forme; for all the Doctors were assembled vpon Sunday, and the case was amongst them solemnly and earnestly disputed all Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and this present Friday in the morning. And thereupon they concluded with your Highnesse, and desired a Notary to set his signe and hand vnto an instrument by Leonicus and Simonecus deuised, in Corroboration of your cause, and thereby to testifie that this instrument was their deed, deuise, act, and conclusion. And more credence to be giuen to the said instrument they caused the Chancellor of the Potestate hereto to set his hand and seale for the approbation of the Authority of the Notary: A Coppy of all the which things I send vnto your Highnesse by this Bearer, in most humble wise beseeching the same to be aduertised that the Generall of the Blacke Friers hath giuen commandement that no Blacke-frier dispute the Popes Power: Notwithstanding Prior Thomas Omnibonus procureth daily new superscriptions, and will doe till the briefe of contrary commandement shall come vnto his hands. My fidelity bindeth me to aduertise your Highnesse that all Lutherans be vtterly against your Highnesse in this cause, and hath letted as much with their wretched poore malice, without reason or authority, as they could and might, aswell here as in Padua and Ferrara, where be no small company of them: I doubt not but all Christian Vniuersities if they be well handled, will earnestly conclude with your Highnesse. And to obtaine their assent as well through Italie, France, Almaine, Austrich, Hungary, and Scotland, I thinke it maruellous expedient for the preferment of this your most honourable and high cause.

The decree of the Lawyers in the Vniuersity of Paris.

We the Deane and Colledge of the Vniuersity of Paris, after many disputations and reasons, made vpon both sides, turning and searching of Bookes, both by the Law of God, the Popes Law, and the Ciuill Law; we say, that the Pope hath no Power to dispence in this case of Matrimony. The Iudgement of the Diuines in the Vniuersity of Paris.

The Deane and the faculty of holy Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Paris, to all them to whom this present writing shall come, wisheth safety in Christ; For the Question proposed, we came together in the Church of Saint Martin, and there, for the same cause, had a solemne Masse of the Holy Ghost, and vpon our oathes determine, that the foresaid Marriage with the Brothers wife departing without children is so forbid by the Lawes of God and Nature, that the Pope hath no power to dispence with such Marriages, whether they be contract or to be contracted; to which this our assertion we haue caused the Seale of our faculty, with our Notaries signe to be put to this present writing. Dated in our Generall Congregation. Iuly 2. Anno 1530.

After wee the Doctors and Rector had discussed and examined many places, as well of the Law of God, as of mans Law, vpon sufficient deliberation taken, wee define and determine, that neither by the Law of God, nor of Nature, it is permitted for any Christian man, no not with the authority of the See Apostolicke, or with any dispensation granted by the Pope, to marry the wife that his brother hath left. In witnesse whereof wee haue commanded the Scribe of our Vniuersity to signe this present publike instrument with the great Seale of our said Vniuersity.

Enacted in the Church of Saint Peter in Anion. May 7. Anno 1530.

The Determination of the Vniuerſity of Burges.

We the Deane and faculties of Diuinity, in the Vniuerſity of Burges, after the example of Saint Paul the Doctor of the Gentiles, begin with prayer to the quieting of the conſcience, to whom this our writing ſhall come; The Queſtion moued, is whether the brother taking the wife of his dead brother, the marriage conſummated, and perfect, be a thing lawfull or no. We by much labour and turning of Bookes, euery one of vs apart by himſelfe, free from corruption, the better to obey the truth, find it forbidden by the Leuiticall Law, which is Gods, and that ſuch marriage is an abhominable diſcouering of his brothers ſhame, which cannot be allowed by the authority of any man: which our determination wee haue cauſed to be ſigned with the Seale of our faculty, the tenth day of Iune, and yeere of our Lord 1530.

All we Doctors of Diuinity in this Vniuerſity, vnto whom this Queſtion was propounded, whether it was forbidden onely by the Ordinance of the Church, or elſe by the Law of God, that a man might not marry the left wife of his brother departed without children, and hauing examined the matter euery one of vs alone, laſtly came altogether, and as it were line by line, and rule by rule, brought forth the reaſons for the contrary part, with thoſe of the moſt Reuerend Father Cardinal Caietaine, yea and of the diſpenſation for raiſing vp ſeed to his brother, ſpoken of in Deuteronomie; thus we determine, giue iudgement, and ſay, and confidently doe hold and witnes that ſuch marriage is horrible, accurſed, and to be cryed out vpon, and vtterly abhominable, not onely for a Chriſtian man, but for an Infidell, vnfaithfull, or heathen: and that it is prohibited vnder grieuous paines and puniſhments by the Law of God, of Nature, and of man, and that the Pope, though he may doe much, vnto whom Chriſt gaue the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen, hath no power to a diſpenſation to any man to contract ſuch marriage: In witnes whereof we confirme this our iudgement, both vnder the Seale of our Vniuerſity, as alſo with the Seale of our Colledge of Doctors of Diuinity, and haue ſubſcribed it in the Cathedrall Church of Bonony, this tenth of Iune, the yeere of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the Vniuerſity of Padua.

Seeing that certaine great Orators and Ambaſſadors did humbly require of vs, that wee would vouchſafe to ſearch out with all diligence this Queſtion following, Whether to marry the wife of our brother departed without children, is forbidden onely by the Law of the Church, or by the Law of God alſo: and if forbid by both the Lawes, whether the Pope may diſpence with any man for ſuch Matrimony or no? which Queſtion we haue diſcuſſed, and as farre as wee can, haue made it cleare, both priuate euery man by himſelfe, and after altogether openly, we ſay, iudge, decree, witneſſe, and for truth affirme, that ſuch marriage is no marriage: yea, and that it is abhorred and curſed of euery Chriſtian man, and to be abominate as a grieuous ſin, and that it is clearely forbidden, vnder cruell penalty, by the Lawes of nature, of God, and of man, and that the Pope, vnto whom the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen are committed by Chriſt the Sonne of God, hath no power to diſpence, by the right of law, for any cauſe, ſuggeſtion, or excuſe, that any ſuch Matrimony ſhould be contracted. In witneſſe whereof we haue made this writing, and haue authorized it, with the accuſtomed Seale of our Vniuerſity: dated at Padua, in the Church of the Heremites of Saint Auguſtine, the firſt of Iuly, and yeere of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the Vniuerſity of Tholouze.

It was treated in our Vniuerſity of Tholouze: whether it were lawfull for a brother to marry her which had beene wife to his brother now departed, and without children: as alſo, whether the Pope, which hath the cure of Chriſts flock, allowing it by his diſpenſation it be lawfull: to reſolue which, the beſt Doctors of Diuinity, and the Lawes, did ſweare that they would obey the ſacred Counſels, and would follow the holy Decrees of the Fathers, and falling to concluſion ſtucke faſt vpon this poynt, that it is lawfull for no man, neither by the Law of God, nor by the Law of nature, to take her to wife that his brother hath left; neither can the Pope diſpence with this law of God: as touching the commandement in Deuteronomy, that the brother ſhould marry his wife to raiſe vp ſeede vnto him, that his name ſhould not periſh among the Tribes of Iſrael, we anſwere that that Law was but a ſhadow and figure of things to come, which vaniſhed away as ſoone as the ſubſtance of the Goſpel appeared. Thus haue wee giuen our ſentence, which we haue ſigned with our Authenticall Seale of this Vniuerſity. Yeouen at Tholouze, the Calends, or firſt day of October, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

These and many more were read by the Lord Chauncellour vnto the lower Houſe of Parliament that they might report in their Countries, the Kings juſt cauſe of diuorce: And with what key Henry opened the golden ſhut of the Popes Conſiſtory for his free acceſſe, therein to enroll his owne Banes, to his beſt liking, I cannot ſay, but thus I finde it confirmed by a Bull of Pope Clement the ſeauenth, dated three yeares before theſe publiſhed determinations in theſe words.

Bulla Clementis Sept. Conceſſa Henrico Octauo de ſecundis nuptijs contrahendis conſtante nullitate primarum.

Clement Biſh. Seruant of the Seruants of GOD, to our dearely beloued Sonne in Chriſt, Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, health, and Apoſtolicall benediction.

You cauſed not long ſince to be ſignified vnto vs, that you, and our beloued daughter in Chriſt Katherine, the late widdow of your brother Arthur, (not being ignorant how nearely you were otherwiſe ioyned together in the firſt degree of affinity) haue made a contract of matrimony by words otherwiſe lawfull, hauing at that preſent obtained no diſpenſation, at leaſt-wiſe Canonicall or of any force for the ſame. That you haue confirmed it with carnall knowledge one of another, and haue thereby brought forth a Childe, incurring the cenſure of excommunication. Moreouer, that (in regard your Maieſty may not remaine in ſuch kinde of Matrimony without great offence to God, and that you might not continue longer in this ſinne and cenſure of excommunication) your Maieſty doth deſire Abſolution from ſuch cenſure of excommunication at the hands of ſome ſufficient Eccleſiaſticall Iudge. Furthermore, that your Maieſty doth deſire to haue this Matrimony pronounced infirme and of none effect: And that it might be lawfull for you, (notwithſtanding any Canon to the contrary) to make contract with any other woman whatſoeuer. That vpon the pronouncing of the nullity touching this marriage, you might obtaine a diſpenſation lawfully to be ioyned in matrimony, therein freely to remaine and beget a lawfull heire by any other woman whatſoeuer, yea though ſuch ſhee be who hath otherwiſe made contract with any other man, ſo ſhee haue not confirmed it with carnall knowledge: though ſhee be otherwiſe nearely allied vnto you, either by the ſecond or a more remote remote degree of consanguinity, or the first degree of affinity, or joyned to you by any lawfull or vnlawfull lying together: prouided she be not the relict of your said Brother, though she be annexed to you in kindred spirituall, or legall, yea though it be an hinderance to the right of publique honesty. Wherefore in the behalfe of your part (who affirme that it is to be seene in ancient Records of your Kingdome, many great grieuous warres to haue beene rayſed, Christian peace and concord disquieted through the meanes of wicked men stirred vp with their owne detested lust, and desire of dominion, but pretending that those, which haue beene begotten in lawfull marriages of your Ancestors and Progenitors Kings of England were illigitimate, by reason of some fayned impediment of consanguinity or affinitie, and consequently were not capable of the Kingdomes succession, and that there hath followed miserable destructions of Princes, Nobles, and People,) an humble supplication was made vnto vs, that wee would haue a care of the tranquility and peace of your Kingdome and Subjects, and that wee would (out of our Apostolicall benignity) daigne to resist so great euils, and otherwise in the foresaid danger administer some seasonable remedies. We therefore which are ready alwaies (vnder God) to entertaine, and fauourably to grant the honest petitions of all Kings, at least minding the safetie of Soules (but more especially your Maiesties, for its manifold immeasurable benefits towards vs and this holy Seat, wherein by the diuine prouidence of God) wee now sit, not ceasing daily, as well with might and sword, as with penne and learning to free it from the wicked attempts of pestilent men, which aduenture partly by force and wicked boldnesse, partly with peruerse doctrine vtterly to subuert it. We, by the foresaid causes, and some others best knowne to our selues, being moued to such like supplications, by vertue of our Apostolicall authority, out of our certaine knowledge of the matter had by vs, and fulnesse of our Apostolicall power, doe by the tenor of these presents, grant you a dispensation, that if it shall so fall out that the contract with the foresaid Katherine shal be contrarily pronounced void, and of none effect, and that you shall be lawfully freed from all interest in her, that then you may lawfully make contract of matrimony with any other woman, and she with you, prouided she be not to this end enforced by you, yea though such shee be whom hath otherwise contracted her selfe to another man, so she hath not confirmed it with carnall knowledge: though that she be otherwise nearely allied vnto you, either by the second or a more remote degree of consanguinity, be it the first degree of affinity, or ioyned to you by any lawfull or vnlawfull lying together, prouided she be not the relict of your said brother as before, though she be annexed to you in kindred spirituall or legall, yea and be an hinderance euen to the right of publique honesty. And that you may lawfully remaine in this contract, though it were made betwixt you and the said woman, either publiquely or priuately, and perfected by carnall knowledge one of the other. Further, we decree that the issue (perhaps already conceiued, or what hereafter may be conceiued) shall be legitimate, notwithstanding all prohibitions of diuine Lawes and other constitutions or ordinations whatsoeuer published to the contrary, which we (as farre as our Apostolicall authority may stretch it selfe) in this case specially and expresly extenuate, they elsewhere standing in full force as before. Distinctly forbidding in the name of holy obedience charging expresly vnder the pronouncing of Gods holy iudgement, the punishment of a Reprobate, and the rest whatsoeuer ecclesiasticall censures and punishments, which I here pronounce, and promulgate in these writings, that no man hereafter shall either openly or priuately, by Law or otherwise presume, or any way attempt to alledge, propound, or obiect any impediment of a pre-contract which was not compleatly confirmed, or of consanguinity in the second or farther degree, of affinitie in the first degree as before, of kindred spirituall or legall, of hinderance to their honest report as before, against your issue, which by Gods blessing you shall enioy by any Matrimony whatsoeuer to be contracted through the vertue of these presents: or to defame them in words or deeds: Be it not therefore lawfull for any man to infringe, or by any rash attempt whatsoeuer withstand the tenor of our dispensation, decree, derogation, inhibition and charge, which if any one attempt, know hee that hee incurres the wrath of Almightie God, and his blessed Apostles Peter and Paul. Dated in our City Vrbin, Anno Incarnationis Dom. 1527. 16. Kal. Ian. Pontificatus nostri 5°.*

* Et publicæ honestatis iustitiæ impedimentum subsistat.

Thus haue we seene the determinations of diuerse Accademies in Christendome, and likewise of Pope Clement himselfe, confirmed by his Bull: the first, condemning the retention of that vnlawfull bed: and the other, admitting any other into his bosome, his Brothers relict onely excepted. So that the wrongs done by King Henry vnto Queene Katherine in that diuorce, are nothing so capitall, as her fauourers alledge them, at least-wise if we hold Pope Clement for an honest man; or his Cardinall Wolsey a sure pillar to be leaned vpon, who was a prime actor in the said deuorce. To forward which, he went Ambassador into France, laden with Crownes, as Guiccharden saith, and with surpassing pompe, as London beheld, when with twelue hundred Horse he passed the Bridge for Amiens, there to negociate of this and other businesses with Francis the French King.

But the rumours in England still spreading of the good Queenes diuorce, about a yeare after, King Henrie to satisfie all, sent for his Nobles, his Councellors, Iudges, and many wise Commoners, vnto whom hee made a most pithy Oration, shewing them with what "care he had ruled almost twenty yeares with honour "and victory, which (as hee said) would shortly be "clouded, if he should die and leaue them a litigious "Heire, examples he shewed of the wofull experience "of Lancaster and Yorke, in whose dissentions the "Realme was like to haue beene vtterly destroyed: "and although (saith hee) we haue a daughter, to the "great comfort of her mother and me, yet it is told vs "by great Clerkes, our marriage is not lawful, but that "she stands in case of illegitimation; and wee both, are "said to liue in abominable Adultery: thinke you (my "Lords) that these words doe not touch my very "Soule, the perill whereof we venture, as you doe also "your Inheritance? for which cause I haue asked coun-"sell of the greatest Clerks in Christendome, and haue "likewise heard the opinion of mine owne. But as "touching the Queene, if it be judged by the Law of "God that shee is my lawfull Wife, there shall be no-"thing more acceptable vnto me, whose noble conditi-"ons, I assure you, (besides her great Parentage) is most "gentle, louing, and obedient, whereof I haue had a "true experience almost these twenty yeares: and "were I to choose a wife (if the marriage might stand "with Gods Law) my Choyse should be of her, be-"fore any other woman in the world, and if it shall o-"therwise be proued, I shall not onely be most sorrow-"full for parting with so louing a companion, but "much more haue occasion to lament my chance, and "life in so foule a sinne; these then are the sores that "torments my minde, for the sauing of my Soule, and "for which cause I haue here assembled you, that you "may declare to our louing subjects this our true mea-"ning, and to stay (if it may be) the rumours of vn-"stayed reports. And this being said, he let them to depart, each man bewraying in countenance the affection of his minde, some pittying the King to see him so perplexed, some, fauouring the Queene, sorrowed her case, and some sighed deeply at this strange speech and sudden alteration.

(68) But the Cardinall of Yorke returned out of France, and now fearefull to wade too farre alone in these troubled waters, desired the assistance of the learned in the Realme, and thereto got the Kings license, which with his Legantine authority, commanded many learned men, both Diuines and Lawyers, from Oxford and Cambridge, with the presence of many Bishops besides. These assembled at London, were shewed the Instruments and Seales of many forraine Vniuersities, all of them disabling the marriage, and holding the diſpenſation (allowing it) vnlawfull: but becauſe that ſtring could not be touched without ſound of reproach to the Pope, as alſo to cleare the King from calumnious reports; it was thought fitteſt to ſend the ſaid inſtruments to Rome, whereunto theſe ſo appoynted ſet their owne Seales, with an humble requeſt to his Holineſſe, that an indifferent Iudge might be ſent them, to determine this great and ſtrange cauſe of the King; which was ſo followed by his Ambaſſadors in the Popes Court, that Laurence Campius, a Cardinall of great credit and wiſdome, from their Conſiſtory was ſent into England, vnto whom, wiſe Wolſey Cardinall of Yorke was joyned in Commiſſion, with power to erect a Court, to heare the cauſe pleaded, and to giue ſentence definitiue as they found the equity of law.

Cardinall Campius commeth into England.

The King and Queene ſummoned to appeare perſonally in the Court at Blacke-Friers.

(69) To that end therefore a place was ordayned at the Blacke-Friers in London, and the King with the Queene remoued themſelues vnto his palace of Bridewell neere adioyning, whence ere long they were ſummoned by Proceſſe perſonally to appeare in Court, which accordingly they did, hauing ſeuerall ſeats ordained vnder clothes of eſtate, mounted ſomewhat higher then the two Cardinals, the Preſidents, vnder whoſe feete ſate the Scribes and other Officers; the Court being framed Conſiſtory-wiſe, was furniſhed with Biſhops, Doctors, Lawyers, and learned Counſellors, in moſt ſolemne wiſe: the Doctors for the King, were Simpſon and Bell, and his Proctors Peter and Tregonell: for the Queene were Fiſher, Standiſh, and Ridley, a very little man, but a great Diuine, the Court thus ſet, and Commiſſion read, the Cryer called the King, by the name of King Henry to come into the Court, who forthwith anſwered and ſaid, Here. Then was the Queene called by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court, who made no anſwere at all, but preſently roſe vp, and going about the Court to the King, fell downe on her knees, before his feete, and in the hearing of the people, ſpake thus in effect.

Queene Katherines ſpeech to the King.

"Sir, I deſire you to take ſome pitty vpon mee, and "doe me Iuſtice and Right: I am a poore Woman, a "ſtranger borne out of your Dominions, hauing here "no indifferent Councell, and leſſe aſſurance of friend-"ſhip. Alaſſe, wherein haue I offended, or what "cauſe of diſpleaſure haue I giuen, that you intend "thus to put mee away? I take GOD to my Iudge, "I haue beene to you a true and humble Wife, euer "conformable to your will and pleaſure, neuer gaine-"ſaying any thing wherein you tooke delight, with-"out all grudge or diſcontented countenance; I haue "loued all them that loued you, howſoeuer their affe-"ctions haue beene to mee-ward; I haue borne you "Children, and beene your Wife now this twentie "yeares; of my Virginitie and marriage-bed, I make "GOD and your owne conſcience the Iudge, and if "it otherwiſe be proued, I am content to be put from "you with ſhame. The King your Father in his "time for wiſdome was knowne to be a ſecond Salo-"mon, and Ferdinando of Spaine my Father, accoun-"ted the wiſeſt among their Kings; could they in "this match be ſo farre ouer-ſeene, or are there now "wiſer and more learned men, then at that time "were? ſurely, it ſeemeth wonderfull to mee that "my marriage after twenty yeares ſhould be thus "called in queſtion with new inuention againſt mee, "who neuer intended but honeſty. Alaſſe, Sir, I "ſee I am wronged, hauing no Counſell to ſpeake "for mee, but ſuch as are your Subjects, and cannot "be indifferent vpon my part. Therefore I moſt "humbly beſeech you, euen in Charity to ſtay this "courſe, vntill I may haue aduiſe and counſell from "Spaine; if not, your Graces pleaſure be done. And therewithall riſing, and making lowly obeyſance to the King, departed thence, leaning vpon the Arme of her receiuer, each man expecting ſhee had returned to her ſeat, when as ſhee tooke directly out of the place; which being perceiued, the Crier againe called her by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court; Madam, quoth her guide, you are againe called; On, on, ſaid ſhe, it maketh no matter, this is no indifferent Court for mee, therefore goe forward.

Queene Katherine departed the Court.

The Kings report of his Queene.

(70) The King perceiuing that ſhe was departed, preſently ſpake thus vnto the aſſembly. "I wil (quoth "he) in her abſence declare before you al, that ſhe hath "beene to me a moſt true, obedient, and comfortable "Wife, endued with all vertuous qualities and condi-"tions, according to her birth; and in lowlineſſe e-"qualls any of baſer eſtate. With that Cardinall Wol-ſey made vnto the King an humble requeſt, that his Majeſtie would be pleaſed to declare before that honourable audience, whether he had beene the cauſer of this his intended diuorce, wherewith he was charged in the opinions of the people.

The King excuſeth the Cardinall.

"My Lord Cardinall, quoth the King, I can well ex-"cuſe you in this, and rather affirme that you haue "beene againſt me, in attempting it thus farre: but the "chiefeſt motiue for this matter, was the ſcruple of "conſcience, conceiued vpon certaine words ſpoken "by the Biſhop of Bayon, the French Ambaſſadour, "ſent from the King to conclude a marriage betwixt "Prince Henry his ſecond ſonne, Duke of Orleance, "and our onely Daughter Lady Mary, which Bi-"ſhop made doubt, and deſired reſpite to be ſatisfied "for the legitimation of our ſaid Daughter, in reſpect "of our marriage with this Woman, being my owne "Brothers Wife, which preſently engendred ſuch "ſcruples and doubts in me, that my conſcience hath "beene continually vexed, leſt by continuing in that "ſinne after knowledge, I draw Gods indignation a-"gainſt me, which I feare we haue already done in "that he hath ſent vs no Iſſue-Male, and them that "were begot in this Nuptial-bed, no ſooner came into "the World, but were taken againe thence, and hope-"leſſe now of more iſſue by her, it behoueth me to "conſider the ſtate of this Realme, and the danger that "may follow for lacke of a lawfull Prince to ſucceed. "This burden too weighty for my weake conſcience "(not in any diſlike of the Queenes age, or perſon, "with whom I deſire onely to continue, if our marri-"age may ſtand with the law of God) I haue in this "place aſſembled you our graue Prelates, and learned "Diuines, to determine of, and will (God willing) ſub-"mit my ſelfe to your judgements. My doubts in "this caſe I moued in confeſſion to you my Lord of "Lincolne, and ghoſtly Father, whereof your ſelfe be-"ing ſomewhat troubled, ſaid you would aske coun-"ſell of you all my Lords. Then of you, my Lord of "Canterburie being Metropolitane, I got licenſe to "put the matter in queſtion, to which grant you all "put your Seales, as here in this Court the ſame is to "be ſeene. True it is, ſaid the Lord of Canterburie, and I doubt not but that all my Brethren here preſent will acknowledge the ſame. Not ſo my Lord, ſaid the Biſhop of Rocheſter, you neuer had my hand to that Inſtrument, nor neuer ſhall. Indeed, ſaid Canterbury, you did it not your ſelfe, but admitted me to ſubſcribe your name, and allowed me your Seale; vnder your correction, ſaid Rocheſter, that is not ſo; Well, well, (quoth the King) you are but one man, againſt whom at this time we will not diſpute, and ſo roſe vp, and the Court adjourned vntill another day. Which was vpon the next following, twentieth of May, the two Cardinals being ſet, the Lawyers were ready vpon either parts. Againſt the lawfulneſſe of the marriage, was alledged the other, formerly ſolemnized with Prince Arthur, the Kings elder Brother, and the Nuptiall knowledge of Lady Katherines body, which was vehemently proſecuted by the Kings learned Councell, by many reaſons and likelihoods of truth: one was, that Prince Henry had beene deferred from creation and title of Prince of Wales, the ſpace of ſixe months after Arthurs deceaſe, as doubtfull whether Lady Katherine had beene by him conceiued with childe; for which cauſe, as was alledged, the ſaid Lady had procured a ſecond Bull from the Pope, with this toleration, Vel forſan cognitam, and peraduenture carnally knowne: which Bull was onely purchaſed to diſpence with this marriage. (71) The Negatiues denied all the preſumptions, eſpecially this laſt, as to farre vnbeſeeming that reuerend aſſembly and honourable Court. But by theſe Authenticall records which M. Fox had in his cuſtody, the matter is paſt all contradiction for her carnall knowledge, where it is affirmed that the Ambaſſadors of Ferdinando, being in England to ſee the ſame marriage conſummated, returned their knowledge of their mutuall conjunction, as that nothing was left vnperformed of any nuptiall right; and they being of yeres able to explete the act, he aboue fifteene, and ſhe aboue ſeauenteene; laide both in one bed almoſt fiue months together, doe aſſure vs the certainety of that, which they made their greateſt doubt, vnleſſe the Popes diſpenſation was a Core to the cauſe. But that ſhee was carnally knowne, the Vniuerſity of Padua had concluded in their ſentence, whom the Emperours Ambaſſadours earneſtly ſollicited, either to retract their ſaid Grant, or to giue forth a new Sentence vpon the caſe that the Queene was not carnaliter cognita ab illuſtriſſimo Principe Arthuro, or to determine that this Matrimony was not dirimendum, which in no wiſe they could obtaine, though they offered very largely to haue it done. Thus from day to day the pleas proceeded, but nothing concluded touching the diuorce; whereupon the King ſent the two Cardinals to perſwade with the Queene to put the whole matter onely to himſelfe, which would be farre better, and more honourable for her, then to ſtand to the tryall of Law.

Great preſumptions that Qu. Katherine had bin carnally knowne by Prince Arthur.

Ex MS. by the Kings Agent.

The Emperour ſought to reuert the ſentence of Padua.

(72) Theſe Legates accordingly repaired to Bridewell, and in the preſence ſtaied for the Queene, who preſently from among her maids at worke came forth vnto them, hauing a skeine of white thread about her necke; at whoſe ſight ſhe ſaid, Alacke my Lords, I am very ſorry to make you attend vpon me; What is your will? If it pleaſe your Grace, (quoth Cardinall Wolſey) to goe into your priuy-Chamber, we will deliuer the cauſe of our comming: My Lord (quoth ſhe) this place is moſt fit, I pray you therefore declare here your mindes. With that he began his ſpeech in Latine, which ſhe preſently interrupted, ſaying, that ſhe vnderſtood the Engliſh very well.

The two Cardinals perſwade the Queene.

Wolſeyes ſpeech to the Queene.

"(73) Madam (quoth the Cardinall) we are come "in good will, to know your Graces minde, in this "great matter of your marriage, and to giue you our "aduiſe with the beſt ſeruice we can. My Lords (ſaid "ſhe) I thanke you, but for anſwere of my reſolution, "I cannot ſo ſuddenly make, the cauſe is great, and "toucheth me very neere; I am here a ſtranger, a poore "woman, lacking wit, not able to anſwere ſuch noble "and wiſe Perſonages as yee be; I haue need of coun-"ſell, and they be in Spaine; for thinke you, my "Lords, that any Engliſh ſubjects, will be for mee a-"gainſt the King? forſooth I know they will not, I "pray your Lordſhips be good vnto mee, a forrainer "and deſtitute of friends, and aſſiſt mee with your "Counſels, which I will be glad to heare. And there-upon taking them by the hands, led them into her Chamber, where they ſtayed ſomewhat long; which done, they departed, and made relation of her anſwer vnto the King. Who nothing pleaſed at the anſwere ſhe made them, ſent againe certaine Lords vnto her, to ſhew her the determinations of thoſe Chriſtian Vniuerſities, who had preſcribed the marriage vnlawfull, and to wiſh her to remit the matter for the quieting of the Kings conſcience vnto foure Prelates, and foure temporall Lords: Vnto whom ſhee anſwered, ſaying, "The King my Father which concluded my "marriage, I am ſure was not ſo ignorant, but he asked "counſell of Clerkes and well-learned men, before hee "married mee the ſecond time: for if he had had any "doubt in my marriage, he would not haue disbur-"ſed ſo great a treaſure as he did, and then all the Do-"ctors agreed my marriage to be good; inſomuch that "the Pope himſelfe, which knew beſt what was to be "done, did both diſpence and ratifie the ſecond mar-"riage, againſt whoſe doings I maruaile that any "perſon will ſpeake or write. But as touching the de-"terminations of the Vniuerſities; I am a woman, and "lacke wit and learning to anſwere to them; but to "God I commit the judgement of that, whether they "haue done juſtly or partially: for this I am ſure, that "neither the Kings Father, nor my Father would "haue condiſcended to our marriage, if it had beene "declared to be vnlawfull; and where you ſay, I "ſhould put the cauſe to eight perſons of this Realme "for quietneſſe of the Kings conſcience; I pray God "ſend his Grace a quiet conſcience: and this ſhall be "your anſwere, that I ſay I am his lawfull wife, and "to him lawfully married, and by the order of the ho-"ly Church, I was to him eſpouſed as his true Wife, "(although I was ſo vnworthy) and in that poynt I "will abide, till the Court of Rome, which was priuy "to the beginning, haue made thereof a determination "and finall end.

The Queenes anſwere.

(74) The King then hopeleſſe of his Queenes conſent, haſted his Lawyers to forward their diuorce, which daily they did, and the Conſiſtory at Blacke-Friers daily frequented, all points in Law were opened to the full, ſo that nothing now remained but the ſentence of the Iudges: for which a ſolemne day was aſſigned, when the King in perſon came to heare it himſelfe. His ſeat taken, and the Court ſet, after a crie for ſilence, the proceedings were openly read, and all doubts cleared, the learned Counſell at Barre called for Iudgement, whereunto Campius, the Popes ſtout Champion, vpon his ſtiffe gouty legges ſtood vp, all men expecting the ſentence of Diuorce, but the Cardinall now not to learne what he had formerly determined, ſaid flatly, "I will not giue judgement in this "matter, too high for vs, conſidering the eſtates of the "Perſons, and the doubtfulneſſe of the occaſions al-"leaged, vntill I haue made a full relation to the Popes "Holineſſe of all our proceedings, whoſe counſell and "commandement in this caſe I will obſerue and fol-"low, vnder whoſe authoritie we ſit and are Commiſ-"ſioners, therefore I will adjourne the Court for "this time, according to the order of the Court of "Rome, from whence our ſemblable juriſdiction is de-"riued. Which, how it diſpleaſed the King, the Sequell will ſhew, and how then taken, the words of the Duke of Suffolke did well declare, who ſtepping forth, with a ſterne countenance vſed theſe words; "It was neuer merry in England ſince we haue had a-"ny Cardinals among vs.

Cardinall Campius referreth the cauſe of Diuorce to the judgement of the Pope.

The ſaying of the Duke of Suffolke.

The Iudgement thus ſtaid, the King ſent his Secretary Stephen Gardiner to Rome, to follow that Court, whether Queene Katherine had made her appeale: and Cardinall Campius admitted to depart, went away in no ſuch eſtate as was held fit for a Man of his place, but rather as one ſuſpected to carry with him more then his owne, had all his Cheſts ſearched at Calis, euen to the Cloke-bags and Males. The cauſe of this ſtay (ſaith Sleidan) was, that the French King, an entire friend vnto Rome, had no better ſucceſſe in Naples, againſt the Emperour, whom the Pope durſt not diſpleaſe, the Lady Katherine being his Aunt, for whom the Emperour was ſo earneſt, as in her behalfe he laboured Millan and many other places, that their learned men ſhould not determine againſt the ſaid Queene. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, that Campius denied his ſentence for the Diuorce, certaine it is, that Cardinall Wolſey fell likewiſe in great diſpleaſure of the King, though he ſought to excuſe himſelfe with want of ſufficient authority: but now his Sunne hauing paſſed the Meridian of his greatneſſe, began by degrees againe to decline, till laſtly it ſet vnder the cloud of his fatall eclipſe.

The cauſe why Campius ſtayed ſentence.

(75) Formerly we haue ſpoken of the riſing of this man, who now being ſwolne ſo bigge by the blaſts of promotion, as the bladder not able to containe more greatneſſe, ſuddenly burſt, and vented forth the wind of all former fauours. Vaine-glorious he was, in ſtate, in dyet, and in rich furniture for houſe, and in prodigall intertainements, more like to a Prince then a Prelate, attended with ſo many officers, and ſeruants, as is almoſt incredible, were not his Check-roll yet to be ſeene. At his Maſſe he was ſerued by Dukes, and Earles, who took the aſſaie of his wine on their knees, and held him his Baſen at the Lauatorie. And being Ambaſſadour vnto the Emperour at Bruſſels, was there waited vpon by many Noble-men of England, and ſerued at Table by his ſeruitors vpon their knees, to the great admiration of the Germaines which beheld it: and indeed ſo much ouer-topped the Pompe of a ſpirituall function, as hee ſeemed to the more humble, to be mad for joy; and him doth Campian judge, rather to be a Baſtard of ſome Prince, then the ſonne of a Butcher; ſo moulded for the one, and ſo far mounting from the other: exceedingly wiſe he was, and very well ſpoken, but full of reuenge, and vicious of body, thrall to affection, and lulled aſleepe with flattery, inſatiable to get, but princely in beſtowing, lofty to his enemies, and not eaſily reconciled, which haſtened his fall, when he firſt began to ſlip. Queene Katherine in her cauſe, did grieuouſly accuſe him; the Councell for their parts did article againſt him; the Law found him in a premunire vnto the King; and Sir Thomas Moore in the high Court of Parliament, inueighed bitterly againſt him.

(76) The firſt ſtep of his diſcent was his diſlike of the Kings affection vnto Anne Bullen, a Gentlewoman nothing fauourable to his Pontificall Pompe, nor no great follower of the Rites of thoſe times, which moued the Cardinall (the Pope hauing aſſumed the ſentence of Queene Katherines cauſe vnto himſelfe) to write vnto his Holineſſe to deferre the judgement of Diuorce, till he had wrought the Kings minde in another mould. This was not done ſo ſecretly, but that it came to the Kings eare, and laſtly coſt the proud Cardinall his life. For the broad Seale firſt taken from him, and his other Biſhopricks elſewhere beſtowed, his Houſe and furniture ſeazed vpon, and himſelfe remoued into the North, at Cawood-caſtle ſeuen miles from Yorke, was ſuddenly arreſted (for arrogant words importing a deſire of reuengement, ſaith Sleidan) by the Earle of Northumberland, whence he was conueied toward London by the lieutenant of the Tower, in which journey at Leiceſter Abbey hee ended his life, whoſe death himſelfe had haſtened by taking an ouer-much quantity of a confection to breake winde from off his ſtomacke, and in that Church was there enterred.

(77) The grudges againſt this Cardinall were many and great, not onely for the eſpeciall fauour he ſtood in with the King, and great ſtroake he bare at Counſell-Boord, (both which commonly breed emulation vnto the man ſo eſtated) but for his intollerable pillings, who to patch vp his pride in the raiſing of his new Colledges, erected at Oxford and Ipſwich by the licenſe of Pope Clement 7. ſuppreſſed fortie Monaſteries of good fame, and bountifull Hoſpitalitie, conuerting all their goods and moueables into his owne Cofers; which were ſo ſtuffed with treaſure, that twelue Barrels full of Gold and Siluer were laide aſide, to ſerue the Pope in his warres. As alſo, that he emptied the Land of twelue-ſcore thouſand pound, enforced by him from the King. All which hee conuerted to relieue, and ranſome the Pope then in Priſon, to the great impoueriſhing of his Majeſties Cofers. That his owne reuenews by his faculties, licenſes, and other legantine exactions did equalize the Kings yearely Reuenewes, and laſtly his pride ſo intollerable, as no leſſe then twelue hundred Horſe for his retinue, foure-ſcore Wagons for his carriage, and threeſcore Mules for ſumpter-Horſes attended him into France. But ſic tranſit gloria mundi, for the higheſt floud is ſubject to an ebbe.

(78) But whilſt the matter of the Kings marriage hung thus in ſuſpence the ſpace of two yeares, and other Ambaſſadors intended to be ſent vnto Rome: it chanced Doctor Cranmar, Doctor Stephens, and Doctor Fox to meete at Waltham at one Table, where the two latter, great Agents for the King, fell in diſcourſe of his cauſe, by tearmes and ſtrength of the Ciuil-Law. Well, ſaid Doctor Cranmar, if I might be heard, I thinke much better it might be tried by Gods Law: whereby the King ſhould be ſurer ſetled in the cauſe of his Conſcience, then thus to be poſted off with delayes from yeare to yeare. This ſpeech Doctor Fox made knowne to his Majeſty, which ſounded very tunably in his eare, then was Cranmar ſent for, conferred with by the King, and commanded to write his minde in the matter, but with this caution prefixed, not to reſpect the perſons but the cauſe; who to him commended the vertuous perfections of his Queene, with whom aboue all others he moſt deſired to continue, if their marriage could be made warrantable by Gods Laws: to which end he commended the care of Bookes, and of his other Prouiſions vnto the Earle of Wiltſhire at Durham Place. The Doctor thus ſet on worke, when he leaſt looked to be ſo imployed, proued by Scriptures, Generall Councels, Ancient Writers, beſides the preſent, and his owne opinion, That the Biſhop of Rome had no authority to diſpence with the word of God, nor the Scriptures.

(79) The treatiſe thus finiſhed, hee preſented it to the King, which when he had well read, and weighed the ſubſtance therein contained; Will you (quoth he) Maſter Doctor, abide by what you haue writ? That will I by Gods grace ſaid Cranmar, euen before the Pope himſelf, if your Majeſty will ſo aſſigne it; Marry, quoth the King to him ſhall you go. Wherupon Thomas Bullen Earle of Wiltſhire, Doctor Stokeſley, Elect of London, Doctor Lee the Kings Almoner, the Doctors Crane, Bennet, and Cranmar, were ſent to the Pope then at Bononie in Italy. The day approached for audience of their Ambaſſage, and the high Prelate ſet vpon his Throne of Eſtate, the Doctor prepared to make his Oration in defence of what he had writ, when on the ſuddaine he was interrupted by an vnmannerly ſpaniell of the Earles, who ſeeing the Pope put forth his foot to be kiſt, caught in his teeth the Pontificals great Toe, ſo that theſe Ambaſſadours diſdaining to kiſſe where the dogge had taken an aſſay, let the Pope draw backe his foot, and ſo loſt that eſpeciall fauour offered vnto them. The Propoſition then made, that no man, jure diuino, could or ought to marry his Brothers Wife, and that the Biſhop of Rome by no meanes could diſpence to the contrary, was replied vnto, that it ſhould be anſwered at more leaſure, when his Holineſſe returned to Rome; in the meane while, to grace Cranmar the more, he gratified him with the office of the Penitenciariſhip, and ſo diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors: who all, ſauing Cranmar, returned to England; but he tooke his way towards the Emperour, (to whom the cauſe ſomewhat appertained) being then at Vienna in his expedition againſt the Turke, vnto whoſe learned men he offered diſputation, and in priuate conference ſo ſatisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the moſt reſpected for learning in the Emperours Court, as he held the Propoſition moſt true. Whereupon, others learned, were diſcouraged to diſpute, and ſuffered Cranmar to depart without any further proceedings.

(80) The matter thus manifeſted in moſt parts of Chriſtendome, this Gordians knot was laſtly vnlooſed by King Henry himſelfe, who now beſides this his marriage, began to call in queſtion, what authority the Pope had in his dominions, which being afterwards debated in Parliament, an Act paſſed againſt his vſurped Hierarchy, and all perſons forbidden to appeale, or to make any paiments vnto Rome. The Kings marriage with Lady Katherine, was by the ſame Parliament diſſolued, and his ſeparation from her, made by the Archbiſhop of Canterburie to ſtand good, and effectuall by Law, and that Queene Katherine from thenceforth ſhould be called Princeſſe Dowager, which doings ſhe tooke ſo to heart, as ſhe procured the Popes curſe againſt King Henrie and his Realme, which curſe was ſet vp at Dunkirke in Flanders, for that the bringer thereof durſt come no neerer. And the Pope in reuenge of himſelfe, being ſet in his Conſiſtory accompanied with his Cardinals, proceeded to the Cenſure of theſe great Princes marriage, which hee then adjudged to ſtand moſt firme and Canonicall, and

This was done a yeare after that the King had married Queene Anne, and bare date from Rome, the 23. of March and yeare of Chriſt 1534. When afterwards King Henry ſet his affection vpon the Lady Anne Bullen, a Phenix indeed in his Princely eye, and another Heſter for Englands ſaluation, both in her ſelfe and royall Bud ſucceeding, as the Heauens and World doe witneſſe to this day. She was the daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen Viſcount Rochford, Earle of Wiltſhire, and of Lady Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke. This Earle Thomas her father was the ſonne of Sir William Bullen, whoſe wife was Lady Margaret, the ſecond daughter and Coheire of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormond, and the ſaid Sir William was the ſonne of Sir Godfrey Bullen Lord Mayor of London, who lyeth buryed in S. Laurence Church in the Iewry, pictured in his winding ſheet vpon a plate of Braſſe, & about his Graue-ſtone vpon a border of Braſſe in many places theſe words are written, Now thus, Now thus, Now thus, whoſe Charity was extended vpon the poore Houſholders of that Citie, in diſtributing among them a thouſand pounds. (83) The Romaniſts much fearing that Babell would downe, if Queene Anne might be heard againſt wicked * Haman, ſought to vnder-proppe the foundations therof, with certain deuiſes of their own; and that the ſame might paſſe without note of ſuſpition, they layd their forgery euen vpon Heauen it ſelfe; whoſe pretended Oracle Elizabeth Barton (commonly called, the holy maide of Kent) was made to be; and the pillers of this godleſſe Fabricke were Edward Bocking, a Monke by profeſſion, and Doctor of Diuinity, Richard Maſters, Parſon of Aldington, the Towne wherein ſhe dwelt, Richard Deering a Monke, Hugh Rich a Frier, Iohn Adeſtone, and Thomas Abell, Prieſts, put to their helping hands, and Henry Gould Bachelour of Diuinity, with Iohn Fiſher the Reuerend Father of Rocheſter, imployed their paines to daube theſe downe-falling walles, with their vntempered Morter. The Scribes that ſet their pens for her Miracles, were Edward Thwaites Gentleman, and Thomas Lawrence Regeſter, beſides Haukherſt a Monke who writ a Letter that was forged to be ſent her from Heauen; and Richard Risby and Thomas Gould, were the men which diſperſed her Miracles abroad to the world. This holy maide Elizabeth made a Votariſſe in Canterbury, was taught by Bocking her ghoſtly Father, and ſuſpected Paramour, to counterfeit many fained trances, and in the ſame to vtter many vertuous words for the rebuke of ſin, vnder which, more freely ſhe was heard againſt Luthers Doctrine, & the Scriptures tranſlation, then deſired of many: neither ſo only, but that ſhe gaue forth from God, and his Saints, by ſundry ſuggeſtiue Reuelations, that if the King proceeded in his diuorce, and ſecond marriage, hee ſhould not raigne in his Realme one moneth after, nor reſt in Gods fauour the ſpace of an houre. But the truth diſcouered by Gods true Miniſters, this Oracle gaue place as all other ſuch did, when Chriſt by his death ſtopped their lying mouthes: for her ſelfe and * ſeauen of her Diſciples were executed for Treaſon at Tiborne, and the other ſixe put to their fines and impriſonment. With the like counterfeit reuelations and fained predictions this Generation of Hypocrites had brought Edward Lord Stafford, Duke of Buckingham vnto his vnhappy end, when as by the working of Iohn de la Court, his owne Confeſſor, together with Nicholas Hopkins a Monke of the Carthuſian Order, in the Priory of Henton in Somerſetſhire, who by his viſions from heauen forſooth, heartned him for the Crowne; but before his owne Coronet could aſpire to that top, hee worthily loſt both head and all vpon Tower-hill for his treaſon, Anno Dom. 1521. Vnto ſuch ſinnes the world was then ſubiect, and into ſuch conceits their reputed holineſſe had brought them, not onely among the ſimple and vnlettered, but euen with them that ſeemed to bee learned indeed: for by certaine predictions fore-ſhewing a great deluge, Prior Bolton of Saint Bartholomewes in London, was ſo fearefull, that he built him a houſe vpon the height of Harrow-hill, ſtoring it with prouiſions neceſſary, to keepe himſelfe from drowning, *in An. (84) But the Popes Holineſſe fearing the euent of the game, if euery man might ſet & caſt at his Crowne; thought it high time to lay hand on his own ſtake, and to keepe what was left, leſt all would be gone; to which end he ſollicited many Chriſtian Princes to ſtand on his part, and among them ſent his Briefe vnto Iames the fift King of Scotland, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt King Henry of England, whom in his Conſiſtory hee had pronounced to be an Hereticke, a Schiſmaticke, a manifeſt Adulterer, a publike murtherer, a committer of Sacriledge, a Rebell, and conuict of Læſæ Maieſtatis, for that he had riſen againſt him who was his Lord. And therefore he had iuſtly depriued him of his ſaid Kingdome, and would diſpoſe the ſame to him and other Princes, ſo as they would aſſiſt to recouer the ſame: a very good prouiſion, and very well fore-ſeene; for notwithſtanding theſe boiſterous blaſts from Rome, the King kept his Crowne, and was rather feared of the Popes beſt Abetters, then did feare any potent power that the world could afford, whoſe thoughts were now buſied for the Coronation of his Queene.

Notwithſtanding, to tickle the Kings eare, they preached againſt the Popes ſupremacy, & tooke the Oath for the King themſelues; abolithed his authority by Act of Parliament, and ſuppreſſed many Monaſteries; leauing their reuenewes to the Kings will; faire introductions indeed for what they intended, as the ſequell of the ſixe Articles by them procured, doth manifeſtly ſhew: and thoſe purpoſely made againſt the maintainers of the Goſpell, wherof Queene Anne was the chiefe; who firſt was moſt fauourable to thoſe learned Diuines, that laide mans ſaluation vpon the Rocke Chriſt; next in procuring a tollleration from the King for them, whoſe doctrine did daily vndermine the Papall foundation: and laſtly, ſhe by no meanes would conſent to marry the King, vntill a lawfull diuorce was had for his ſeparation from Lady Katherine, his brother Arthurs wife, which thing this Pope greatly withſtood: theſe were cauſes ſufficient to moue his Holineſſe to bend his brow & by his Inſtruments in Court to cut off this principall mooquer, who fore-ſlowing no time, took the Ball before his rebound.

Out of the relation of a Noble-man.

(93) And by the working of the ſame faith, her penancy was ſeene, in her ſorrowes conceiued, and thirſting reconciliation vnto them whom ſhe had any wiſe offended, as by this worthy example is apparant; when the day before ſhe ſuffered death, being attended vpon with ſixe Ladies in the Tower, ſhe tooke the Lady Kingſton into her Preſence Chamber, and there locking the dore vpon them, willed her to ſit downe in the chaire of Eſtate: whereunto ſhe anſwered, that it was her duty to ſtand, and not to ſit at all in her preſence, much leſſe vpon the ſeat and ſtate of her, her Queene. Ah Madam, quoth ſhe, that title is gone, I am a condemned perſon, and by law haue no eſtate left me in this life; but for clearing of my conſcience, I pray you ſit downe; well, ſaid the Lady Kingſton, I haue often plaide the foole in my youth, and to fulfill your command, I will doe it once more in mine age, and thereupon ſate downe vnder the cloath of eſtate; which no ſooner was done, but that the Queene moſt humbly fell vpon her knees before her, & with teares, holding vp her hands, charged her in the preſence of God and his Angels, as ſhe would anſwere her before them, when all ſhould appeare in iudgement, that ſhe ſhould ſo fall downe before the Lady Maries Grace, her daughter in Law; and in her name in like manner, aske her forgiuenes for the wrongs ſhe had done her, for till that was accompliſhed (ſhee ſaid) her conſcience could not bee quiet: what her offence was to her-ward, we know not, but may be ſuppoſed not to be capitall, the Queenes caſe wayed, the time conſidered, and her enemies none of the meaneſt, onely this I obſerue, that as ſhe cleared her conſcience of the leſſer crimes, ſo vndoubtedly would ſhee haue done of the greater, if any had beene committed, and ſo as her ſelfe inſtantly deſired, I commit her caſe to be charitably ſpoken of, and leaue her and them vnto the Lord.

The example of Queene Agnes penancy.

(94) But as one pillar for the Goſpels defence was fallen by the death of Queene Anne, ſo another was raiſed, by raiſing Cromwell from the baſe of his birth, no better indeed then a Blacke-ſmiths ſonne, who ſeruing great Wolſey in the office of his Solicitor, was employed by him for the ſuppreſſion of forty Monaſteries, to the erection of his Colledges at * Oxford & Ipſwich; by which he mounted thoſe ſteps of eſtate, which ſet (but not kept) him in the high chaire of his authority; firſt by King Henry he was made Maſter of his Iewell-houſe, then Baron of Okeham in Rutlandſhire, then Knight of the Garter, ere long was created Earle of Eſſex, then was he made Lord great Chamberlaine, and laſtly ordained the Kings Vicar Generall; and thus farre fortune brought him from the Forge for a fall.

Statut. in An. 31. Hen. 8. cap. 13.

(95) For King Henry vnſtayed in religious reſolution (the Supremacy ſetled wher he would haue it, and the Reuenewes of all Monaſteries giuen him by Parliament) ſought no further to reforme the Churches abuſes, but onely gaue way that the Lords Prayer, the Creede, and Commandements might be read in Engliſh, which Cromwell procured to be enacted by Parliament. The Commons then miſling that their mumblings muſt downe, and the Monkes ſore troubled to mingle Engliſh in their Maſſes, the Lincolneſhire men began a Commotion, vnder the conduct of D. Mackarell a Monke, who named himſelfe Captaine Gobler, & his followers were growne well neere vnto twenty thouſand. Againſt theſe, the King in perſon prepared, ſending forth his command vnto ſeuerall Counties, to charge them with a taxation of furniſhed Souldiers to meet him at Amphell, as by * one we haue ſeene ſigned with the ſtampe of his hand, and ſent vnto the Biſhop of Exceſter for foure hundred able men,

The Lords Prayer, the Creed, and Commandements in the Engliſh tongue.

Commotions of Lincolneſhire.

* King Henries Letter dated at Windſor 8. of October, and 27. of his raigne.

whereof ſixeſcore to be Archers, which great preparation being knowne to the Rebels, they ſent to his Maieſty theſe Articles, ſubſcribed with many of their hands, the tenour whereof out of the Originall it ſelfe was, as followeth.

To the King our Soueraigne Lord.

The aggreeuances of the Commons of Lincolnſhire.

Pleaſeth it your Highneſſe to be aduertiſed, that your poore Comminalty, true and faithfull Subiects, in your County of Lincolne, at this preſent time aſſembled, findeth our ſelues grieued in theſe Articles hereafter following.

Suppreſſion of Monaſteries.

Firſt, for the ſuppreſſion of ſo many religious houſes, as be at this inſtant time ſuppreſſed. Whereby the ſeruice of God is not onely miniſhed, but alſo the poorealty of your Realme be vnrelieued, and many perſons be put from their liuings, and left at large, which wee thinke is a great hindrance to the Common-wealth.

Act of Vſes.

The ſecond Article is, that we humbly beſeech your Grace, that the Act of vſes may be repealed, becauſe we thinke that by the ſaid Act wee be clearely reſtrained of our liberties, in the declaration of our Willes, concerning our lands: aſwell for the paiment of our debts, for doing of your Grace ſeruice, as for helping and relieuing of our children, which we haue had by the ſufferance of your lawes by a long continuance, which we thinke is great hurt and diſcommodity to the Common-wealth.

Taxe of quindecim.

The third Article is, that where your Grace hath a taxe, or quindecim, granted vnto you by Act of Parliament, payable the next yeare: which is, and euer hath beene leueable of ſchepe and catall: And the ſchepe and catall of your Subiects within this ſaid Shire, are now at this inſtant vtterly decayed and gone. Whereby yff your Grace will take the ſaid taxe, Your ſaid Subiects ſhould be conſtrained to pay iiij. d. for a beaſt, and xij. d. for xx. ſchepe: And that would be an importunate charge to theym, conſidered the pouerty that they be in already, and the loſſe which they haue ſuſtained theſe two yeares by-paſt.

Counſellors diſliked.

The fowrt Article is, that we your true and faithfull Subiects, thynkes that your Grace takes of your Councell, and very nygh about you, ſuch Perſonages as be of lawe birth, and ſmale reputation, which haue procured the premyſſes, moſt eſpeciall for their ſingler lucre and aduantage: the which we ſuſpect to be the Lord Cromwell, and Sir Richard Rich Chancellor of the augmentations.

Tenths of ſpirituall liuings.

The fift Article is, your Grace to haue the x^th. and firſt fruites of euery ſpirituall promotion, of the value of xx. l. and aboue. And of all other vnder the ſaid value which doe not keepe reſidence and hoſpitality of their ſaid Benefices.

Diſlike of Biſhops:

The ſixt Article is, that wee your true Subiects finde them grieued, that there bee diuers Biſhops of Yngland, of your Grace late promotion, that haue ſubuertyd the faith of Criſt, as wee thinke, which is the Archbyſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhoppe of Rocheſter, the Byſhoppe of Saliſbury, the Byſhop of Saint Daueys, and the Byſhop of Deuelyn. And in eſpeciall as wee thinke the beginning of all the troble of this Realme, and the gret exactions that hath beene taken of your poore Communalty, haue riſen by the occaſion of the Biſhop of Lincolne: by whoſe Officers, and by other of the Lord Cromwels ſeruants, a great rumor and noyſe is riſen, and the commune voce is, that ſuch Iowellys, Plate, and other anornaments of our Pariſh Churches, which wee occupy in the ſeruice and honour of God, ſhould be taken from vs, and ſpoiled in like maner and facion, as the houſys of Religion hath bene. For a reformation of all and ſyngler the aforeſayd abvſes, Wee your poore and trewe Subiects humble reguirys your Grace and Maieſty, that it might pleaſe your Highneſſe to call vnto you the Nobility of this your Realme, to ſee ſuch Order and direction concerning all & ſingler the premiſſes, as may ſtand with honour and ſewerty of your Grace, the welthe and proſperity of your Realme, and the contentation of vs your poore Subiects, and other the whole Communalty of this your Realme.

Thom. Cranmer. Iohn Fiſher.

Iohn Longland.

Whereby

Whereby we ſhall not onely accept your Grace to be the Head and Soueraigne of vs your Subiects, but alſo accept and take your Grace to be Supreame head of the Church of Ingland, which wee doe knowledge your Grace trewe inheritance and right.

The Commons requeſt for the bearer.

Alſo your ſaid trewe and faithfull ſubiects, with the hole aſſent of all your Communalty of the ſaid Shire, moſt humbly beſechith your gracious Maieſty, to pardon this poore bearer in doing this his meſſage to your Highneſſe, who is your trewe and faithfull ſubiect, and hath taken this meſſage vpon him for the feruent loue that he hath to your Grace moſt in eſpeciall, and for the ſtaying of your Cominaltie euer ſens this ruffull began, hath bene as glad with all his diligence to ſtay the commune people for the effuſion of bloud, as bee all his powre he might. The King with good words pacified theſe Commons, who laying aſide weapons, imbraced their pardons.

Commotions in Yorkeſhire.

(96) But this cloud ſcarſly ouer-blowne, another more dangerous aroſe in the North, which threatned ſoarer ſtormes by the Skies ouer-caſt: for 40000 Ruſtickes aſſembled in Yorkſhire, furniſhed with Horſe, Armour, Artillery, and Abillements for warre, threatned to ſet the ſtay of Eſtate vpon the props of their giddy inuentions. Their pretence was Religion, and defence of holy Church, their Banners painted with the fiue wounds of our Lord, the Challice, the Cake, and other like inuentions of Rome, and vpon their ſleeues was writ the name of the Lord: and ſo forward and feruent were they in their proceedings, that this their attempt muſt be termed the holy Pilgrimage. Holy Pilgrimage.

Neither were the Rurall onely guilty in this rebellion, but others of greater place and degree were aſſociates, namely, Edward Lord Archbiſhop of Yorke, and the Lord Thomas Darcy, though both of them conſtrained by the Rebels as the ſaid Archbiſhop teſtified vnder his owne hand: but voluntary and moſt forward were the Clergy of thoſe parts, the Lord Lumley, Sir Thomas and Sir William Percies, Sir Robert Conſtable, Sir Francis Bigot, and Sir Robert Neuill, all of them Knights, Iohn Lacy, Richard Beamond, and Robert Bowes Eſquiers; the Bayliffes of Snaythe, of Leeds, Kellam, and of Beuerly. And for Captaine Generall, was Robert Aske a meane Gentleman, and one Rudſtone his aſſociate in the Field. Other Commanders they had out of the common ſort, as Iames Diamond Generall of the Foot, and a poore Fiſher-man, ſtyled by himſelfe and others, the Earle of Pouerty. What authority theſe bare among theſe rude multitude may partly be perceiued by their Mandates, and Commiſſions, ſent forth in their names, and ſubſcribed with their owne hands; as from the Originals of ſome of them is here to be ſeene. Ex M.S. in Sir Robert Cottons Library.

The Captaine of the Commotions Letters.

Lords, Knights, Maſters, Kinſmen, and Friends, we perceiue that ye be informed that this Aſſemble our Pilgrimage, which we by the fauor and mercy of Almighty God intendyth to proceed in, is becauſe the King our Soueraine Lord hath had much inpoceſſions of vs, wee doubt not but ye doe knowne and remember that to our powers we haue beene alwaies as ready in paiments and ſeruices to his Highneſſe as any his ſubiects: and further to acertaine you of the cauſe of our ſaid aſſemble and pilgrimage is this, That forſomuch that ſuch ſimple & euil-diſpoſed perſons being of the kings Councell, hath not only incenſed his Grace with many things which be contrary to the Faith of God, honour of the Kings Maieſty, & the Common-wealth of this Realme: and therby hath deſtroyed, & yet vtterly intendeth to deſtroy the Church of England, and the Miniſters of the ſame, as ye know ſo well as we: but alſo the ſaid Councell hath robbed and ſpoiled, and further intendyth vtterly to rob and ſpoile the whole body of the Kings Realme, and that as well all you, as vs, if God of his infinite mercie had not cauſed ſuch as hath taken, & hereafter ſhal take this pilgrimage vpon them to proceed in the ſame: and whether all theſe things be true or not, we put it to your conſcience. And if ye thinke it be true, and fight againſt vs, which intendeth the Comen-wealth of this Realme, & nothing elſe, we truſt ye ſhall haue ſmal ſpeed: For this pilgrimage we haue taken hyt for the preſeruation of Cryſts Church of this Realme of England, the King our Soueraigne Lord, the Nobility, Barony and Comens of the ſame, and to the intent to make petition to the Kings Highnes for reformation of that which is amiſſe within this his Realme. And for puniſhment of Heretickes and Subuerters of Lawys; & neither for mony, malice, nor diſpleaſure to any perſon, but ſuch as be not worthy to remain neere the King our Soueraine Lords perſon. And further we know if ye ſhould obtaine, as we truſt yn God ye ſhall natt, then ye put both vs and you, your heires and ours in bondage for euer; and further yee are ſure of the interdiction of Cryſts curſe, and we cleare, and out of the ſame: And if we ouercome you, ye ſhall be in our wylls; wherefore for a concluſion, if you wyll not comen with vs for a reformation of the Premiſes, we certifie you by this our writing, that we will feyght & dye, both againſt you, and all thoſe that ſhall be about-wards to ſtop vs in the ſaid pilgrimage: And God ſhall ſhew his Grace and mercy therein: And then ye ſhall be iudged hereafter to be ſhedars of ſome of Cryſtyn bloud, and deſtroyers of your euyn Cryſten. From Robert Aske, chiefe Captaine of the Comynalty aſſembled in pilgrimage, for the Barony and Cominalty of the ſame.

By me Robert Aske yn the name of all the Comynalty and Barony.

Of ſuch terrour and haughty ſpirit was this Captaine Aske, that when Lancaſter an Herald at Armes, was ſent to declare the Kings meſſage in Pomfret Caſtle (which the Rebels had got by ſurrender from the Lord Darcy) he ſo bluſtred out his anſweres, that the daunted man excuſing himſelfe to be but a meſſenger, fell before him on his knees; till the Archbiſhop of Yorke tooke him vp, ſaying, it was not beſeeming the Coat he wore, to proſtrate to any, but only to his Soueraigne. Reade likewiſe if you pleaſe this ſtrange Mandate from ſome meane man among them; the falſe ſuggeſtion that they poſſeſſed the ignorant with, and the Oath wherunto theſe holy Pilgrims were ſworne, as I find them recorded by themſelues in theſe very words. Ex M.S. The audacious dealings of the Rebels.

To the Commyns of Hawkeſide Pariſh, Bayliffes, or Conſtables, with all the Hamlets of the ſame.

Welbeloued we greet you wel, and whereas our brother Pouerty, & our brother Rogers, goith forward, is openly for the aid & aſſiſtance of your faith, & holy Church, and for the reformation of ſuch Abbeys & Monaſteries, now diſſolued & ſubpreſſed without any iuſt cauſe. Wherfore gudde brethers, Foraſmuch as our ſaid brederyn hath ſend to vs for aide and helpe, we doe not onely effectually deſire you, but alſo vnder the paine of deadly ſinne wee command you, and euery of you, to be at the ſtoke Greene beſide Hawkeſide-Kirke, the Saturday next, being the xxviij. day of October by xj. of the clokke, in your beſt array: as you will make anſwer before the heigh Iudge at the dreadfull day of Dome, and in the paine of pulling downe your Houſes, and leaſing of your gudds, and your bodies to be at the Capteyns will: For at the place aforeſaid, then and there, yee and we ſhall take further direction concerning our faith, ſo farre decayed, And for good and laudable Cuſtomes of the Country, And ſuch naughty inuentions and ſtrange Articles now accepted and admitted, ſo that our ſaid brother be ſubdued, they are like to goe furthwards to vtter vndoing of the Commyn-welth.

Slanderous vntruths againſt the King.

(97) And the more to draw forward the rude multitude, which were forward enough of themſelues, they ſet forth in writing theſe ſlanderous vntruths againſt the King.

1 The firſt is, that no Infant ſhall receiue the bleſſed Sacrament of Baptiſme, bott onleſſe an trybett to be payd to the King.

2 The ſecond is, that no man vnder xx^{l}. Lands ſhall eyte no brede made of Wheat, ner Capon, Chekyn, Gois, ner Pigge, bott onleſſe to pay a trybett to the King.

3 The third is, that for euery ploghe-land the King will haue en trybett, with other diuerſe extreme vrgent cauſes, and hertely fare ye well.

The

The Oath of the holy Pilgrimes.

The oath of the Pilgrims.

Ye ſhall nat enter into this our Pilgrimage of Grace for the Commyn-welthe, but only for the loue that you doe bere vnto Almighty Godde, his faith, & to holy Churche militant, the maintenance thereof, to the preſeruation of the Kings perſon, his iſſew, to the purifying of Nobilitie, and to expulſe all vilayne blode, and euill Councellers againſt the Commyn-welthe, frō his Grace & the prinie Counſel of the ſame, & that ye ſhall nat enter into oure ſaid Pilgramege, for no particular profite to your ſelfe, nor to do no diſpleaſure to no priuey perſon, but by Councell for the Commyn-welthe, ner ſlee, ner murder for no enuye, but in youre hertis put away all feare and dread, and take afore you the Croſſe of Criſte, and in your herts his faith, the reſtitution of the Churche, the ſubpreſſion of theſe Heryiyks, and their opynyons, by all the holle contents of this Booke.

And for the obſeruation of this Oath, heare another command of the Commiſſioners, as we finde it recorded.

To the Bayliffes and Communes of the Towne of Skarboro.

Welbelouyd, we Francys Bygod Knighte, and Iohn Halom yoman, in the name of all the Communes, commande and charde you, that ye aſſemble your ſelues together mediately vpon recepete hereof, and ſo take thys othe wychys we here ſend vnto yow, and then after in all haſte poſsible to aſsiſt and hayde theis ower brethren, wome we ſende to you to keepe, & make ſure the Caſtell, Towne, and Port of Skarboro, that no man enter into the ſame Caſtel, that belongys vnto Raſe Euers the yonger knyghte, nor any outher whiches did not take full parte with the Communes, at ower firſt and laſt aſſemblynge, in whoys name, aethority, or attorney, ſoeuer they cume, vnleſſe they haue licence of all the Communes, in like manner, ye ſhall truely keepe all ſichys ordinance, and ſhippe to the vſe of the Communes, wythe wyches we charde you at our late being here, and thys not to faile, vpon paine of yower lyues, ye ſhall refer credence vnto thys meſſyngeres, thus in haſt: Fare ye well, from Settrynton this Mondaye Sancte Mawris daye.

Francis Bygott Knight, in the name, and by commandement of all the Communes.

The Earle of Shrewsbury maketh againſt the Rebels.

Againſt theſe rout of Rebels George Earle of Shrewſbury muſtred his men, not ſtaying for the Kings commiſſion, which made him much ſuſpected, he meant to haue ſided with the Pilgrims himſelfe. To cleare which aſperſions, he made this ſhort (but loyal) Oration vnto his followers, before he entred further into the field.

" How ſoeuer theſe Rebels colour their pretences for "the Weale-publike, and would draw in others to "participate with them; yet certaine it is, that Trai- "tors they be, and traiterouſly doe proſecute what "they wickedly begun. Follow them who liſt in this "lawleſſe enterprize; But I for mine own part meane "not to ſtaine my bloud and Anceſtors by ioyning "my means with ſuch a ſort of Raskals, but wil rather "liue and die in defence of the Crowne; yea, if it ſtood "but vpon a ſtake. Therefore thoſe that will take my "part in theſe buſineſſes, let them follow me; and if a- "ny heare amongſt you be otherwiſe minded, let him "depart; but looke for no more fauour then the Hat- "chet and Halter will afford him. And then in the ſight "of them all he cauſed his Chaplain to adminiſter him "an oath of his loyalty vnto the King. It was likewiſe reported that the Earle of Darby was ſet forward towards them, whom the Pilgrimes well-hoped would haue ſided with them, as by their Mandate ſent to the Brethren appeares, where is forbid that none of them ſhould aide him, vnleſſe he tooke the Oath: which he neuer meant to aſſay or ſweare to.

Thomas Duke of Norfolke Lord Lieutenant of the North.

(98) But true it is the King ſent Thomas Duke of Norfolke Lord Generall againſt them, accompanied with the Marqueſſe of Exceſter, the Earles of Huntingdon and Rutland; who ioyning their powers made towards Doncaſter, where the Rebels then lay in their Randiuou; in whoſe ſight immediately they ſet vp their Tents, and determined battell vpon the next day; but on the night betwixt, ſuch fluds of water fell, that the riuer Dunne ouerflowed his bancke, and admitted no paſſage ouer the Bridge, which thing was taken as a token from God; and thereupon the Lord Generall offered them conference, alledging that the King was tender of his Subiects liues, and very vnwilling to ſhed Chriſtian bloud: that their cauſe ſhould be fauourably heard, and iuſt complaints redreſſed, if with ſubmiſſion & duty of Subiects, they would yeeld themſelues and affaires to the Kings mercy; that this their rebellious proceedings, was not only the fore-running meſſenger of deſtruction to themſelues and partakers, but gaue alſo a great aduantage vnto the Scots, the dangerous enemy vnto the Land, & them all: with theſe and the like perſwaſions the matter was ſo forwarded, that a conference was appointed at Doncaſter, and foure pledges were ſent from the Lord Generall vnto the Commons, for the ſafe returnes of their aſſigned Commiſſioners, which were theſe by name.

Pardon and peace offered to the Rebels.

4 The fourth, that Thomas Cromwell, nor any of his bande or ſerte, be not at owre metyng at Doncaſtre, but abcente themſelfe from the Councell.

5 The fift, to receiue the Kings anſwere by the declarations of the Lords, and to certifie the vere etent thereof to vs there.

Alſo, to know what authority the Lords haue to etreate, in promes with vs ther, as well of owre promes of other things.

Alſo, to know what plege the wyll deliuer for our Capitans.

Alſo, yf thys pertyculars be concluded, then for to condyſcend of other perticulars.

The whole drift was to downe with the Goſpell.

1 The firſt touching our faith, to haue the hereſyes of Luther, Wyclyf, Huſſee, Melanćton, Ecolampadius, Buſyrs, the Confeßion Germane, the Applege of Melanqton, the werke of Tyndale, of Bernys, Fryth, of Marſhall, Raſtell, the Bookes of Sent Germane, and ſuch other of any manner Hereſie, without the Realme, not to be kept, but vtterly to bee dyſtryed.

2 The ſecund, to haue the ſupreme of the Chyrch toching cure of ſowlle to be reſeruyd to the See of Rome, as byfore hyt was accuſtomyd for to be; and to haue the conſecration of Byſhoppys frome him without any firſt fruts, or pencyons to him to be payde out of this Realme, or ellys a pencion reaſonable for the outwarde defence of our fayth.

Alſo, we beſeke humble our moſt drade Soueraign Lord, that the Lady Mary may be legetymate, and the eſtatutes contrary to the ſame to be anulyd for the dome of the tytle that might incur to the Crowne by Scotland, and that to be by Parliament.

Alſo, to haue the Abbeys that be ſuppreſſed to be reſtoryd to their Lands, Howſys, and Goods.

Alſo, to haue the Tents and firſt fruts clearely diſchargyd, onles the Clergy wyll of their ſelfys grant a Rent or Charge to the augmentation of the Crowne.

Alſo, to haue the Freres obſeruans reſtoryd to their houſes againe.

An vncharitable and vnchriſtian motion.

Alſo, to haue the Heretiks Biſhoppys, and temporall men of their ſeete, to haue condigne ponyſment by fire, or ſuch other; or ells to trie ther quarrell with vs and our partakers in battell.

Alſo, to haue the Lord Crumwell, the Lord Chanceller, and Sir Ryc. Rych Knight to haue condigne ponyſment, as ſubuerters of the gud lawes of the Realme; and onetemers of the ſleſe ſect of this falſe heretykes fyrſt inuenter and brengers of them.

Alſo, that the Landys in Weſtmorland, Comberland, Kendale, Denſyd, Furnes, and the Abbeis lands in Yorke, Worſaidyſhire, Kerbyſhire, Neuerdale, mayne be Tenant Right, and the lord to haue at euery change two yeres rent, in the name of a agar ſumme, and no more, according to a grant now made by the Lords to the Commens vnder their ſeales; and this to be done by act of Parlement.

Alſo, the hand-gunnys and Croſſe-boys, with the penalty of the ſame to be repelled, onles hyt be in the Kings Forreſts and Parkes to kyllers of Deere.

Alſo, that Doctor Lee, and Doctor Leyton, may haue condigne ponyſhment for their extortions in time of viſitation, in brybes, of ſome religyous houſes, x. l. xx. l. and for other ſummes, beſyde horſys, vowſens, leaſes, vnder couent ſeallys, by them taken, and other abominable acts by them committed and done.

Alſo, to ſee reformation for the election of Knights of ſhire, and the Burgys, and for the vſe among the Lords in the Perlament after the ancient cuſtome.

Alſo, the Statute for incloſing Intackes to be put in execution, that all Intacks, Incloſys ſyth Anno quarto Henrici ſeptimi be pullyd downe exceding Foreſts, and Parkys to be dyſtrud of their qũtion, and tax now granted by Parlament.

Alſo, to haue the Parlyament in a conuenient place as Nottingham or Yorke, & the ſame to be ſo moued ſhortly.

Alſo, that it may be enacted by authority of Parliament, that all recogniſans, ſtatutys, penaltyes newly forfeyted during the tyme of the Commiſſion may be pardoned and diſcharged, aſwell againſt the King as ſtranger.

Alſo, the priuilege of the Ryght of the Church to be confirmed by act of Parlament, and Pryſts not to ſuffer onles they be degraded; a man to be ſaued by his Booke; Sanctuary to ſaue a man in all cauſes in extreme need, and the Church to ſaue a man for forty daies; and further according to the lawes as they were vſed in the beginning of the Kyngys dayes.

Alſo, the libertyes of the Church to haue their old cuſtoms, as the County-Palatine of Durham, Beuerley, Reppon, S. Peter of Yorke, and ſuch other by act of Parliament.

Alſo, to haue the Statute that no man ſhall declare his will on his land to be repelled.

Alſo, the Statute of treaſon for Wurdys, made ſith Anno xxi. of our Soueraign that now is, to be in like wiſe repelled.

Alſo, that the common Law may haue place aſwell as was vſed in the beginning of your gracious raign, and that all Iniunctions be clearly denied, and not granted, vnleſſe the matter be heard in the Chancery, & there determined.

Alſo, that no man vpon ſub pœna, or Priuy Seale from Trent Northward, appeare but at Yourke, or by Atturney, vnleſſe it be directed vpon pene of allegyance, or for like matter concerning the King.

Alſo, a remedy againſt Exchequor for fining of falſe Offices, and extortions in taking of Fees, for that which is not held of the King, and againſt the promoters thereof.

Theſe were the inſtructions giuen to their Commiſſioners to be conferred vpon; all which as it ſhould ſeeme, were drawne into foure Articles or heads, as by the minute of the Kings anſwere thereunto doth appeare. Which originall wholly penned by King Henries owne hand, I haue here inſerted word for word, to ſhew his learned care both for Church and Common-wealth: the originall it ſelfe remaineth in the Liberary of the worthy Sir Robert Cotton knight Barenet, the ſtorer of all learned antiquities.

Anſware to the demands off the Rebellys in Yorkeſhyre.

28 Hen. 8: December.

Firſt, as touching the mayntenance off the fayth, the termys be ſoo general that hard thay be to be anſward. But yff they meane the fayth off Chryſt, to which all Chryſten men be moſt oblygyd, we declare and proteſt our ſelfe to be he that always do, and haue myndyd to dy and lyue in the puryte off the ſame, and declare that no man can or dare ſett hys fote by ours in prouyng off the contrary: maruelyng not a lytyll that Ignorant pepole wyll goo abowght, or take vpon them to inſtructe vs (which ſume thyng haue bene noted to be lerned) what the ryght fayth ſhold be. Or that they wold be ſo ingrate and vnnaturall to vs theyre moſt ryghtfull King, with owght any our deſart, vpon falſe reports and ſurmyſys to ſuſſpecte vs off the ſame, and gyffe rather credence to forgyd light talys, then to the approued traght by vs thys xxviij. yers vſyd, and by oure deds approued.

The firſt Article.

To the ſeconde, which tochythe the mayntenance off the Chyrche, & lybertes off the ſame, thys is ſo genera apropoſycion that withowgt diſtinctions no man with trawght can anſware it nother. For firſt, the Chyrche whiche they mene muſt be knowne. Secondly, whether they lawfull or vnlawfull lybertes whych they require, I mene bothe by Gods laws, and laws off the Realme. And thes know I dowght not but they ſhal be anſwarde, according to Gods Law, equite and Iuſtice.

The ſeconde Article.

The thyrde tochyth three things, the laws, the Commune-welthe, the directors off the lawes vnder vs. Tochyng the laws, we expreſly dare teſtyfy that blind men denying no colers, nor yet being Iudggs, it ſhall be duly prouy that there were neuer in any of our prediſſeſſours dayes ſo many holſume commodius and benyffyciall Acts made for the Commenwelthe, and yet I mene it ſyns theyre tyme that wolde fayne haue thanke withowght deſert. For our Lord forbedde (ſeyng we haue bene this xxviij. yere your King) that both we and our Counſell ſhuld haue loſt ſo muche tyme, as not to know now better then when we came firſt to our rayne, what were the Commenwelthe, and what the ſelf-conceit were not, & thought the owtherquedance of ſume may chance wil nott lett them to knowledge it ſo; yet I truſt and dowght nott but the moſt part of our louyng Subiects (ſpecially thos which be not ſeducyd by falſe report, do bothe thynke it, accept it, and fynde it ſo.) Now tochyng to the Commune-welthe, what King hath keptt yow all hys ſubiects ſo longe, in welthe & peace ſo longe, withowght takyng or doyng wrong, whon to the other ſo indifferently mynyſter iuſtice to all bothe hye & low; Soo defendyd you all frome owghtward enymyſe; ſo fortyfyed the fronters off the Realme, to his no litytl and in a maner ineſtimable cargs, and all for your welthes and ſurtes. What king hath gyffen among you mo generall or frear pardons. What Kyng hath be lother to punyſhe his Subiects, or ſhewde more marcy amoſt them? Theſe thyngs beyng ſo trew, as no trew man can deny them, it is an vnnaturall and vnkynd demenour off you our Subiects, to beleue or deme the contrary off it, by hous report ſoo euer it ſhuld be.

The third Article

As tochyng the begynyng of our Rayne, wher ye ſay, ſo meny Nobyllmen were Counſelers, hoo were then Counſelers I well remember, and yet off the Temporalte I notte non but two wordy callyng Nobyll, the won Treſourer of Yngland, and the other hye Stuvard off our others, as the *Lord Marney & Darcy, but ſars wel-borne Gentyllmen, and yet off no grett lands, till they were promotyd by me, and ſoo made knyghts and Lords, the reſt wer Lawyers and Preſtes, ſaue two Biſhopys, whyche wer Canterbyry and Wynchester. Yff theſe then be the grett Nobyllmen ye ſpecke off, and ye ſemed then to be content withall, why then nowe be ye nott muche better content with vs, whyche haue now ſo meny Nobylls in dedd, bothe of byrth byrth and condyſſion. For firſt off the Temporalyte in our preve Conſell, we haue the Duke of Norfolke, the Duke of Suffolk, the Markes off Exceter, the Lorde Stuward (when he may come) the Erle off Oxford, the Erle off Suſſex, the Lord Sandes our Chamberlayn, the Lord Admyrall Treſourer off our Houſe, Sir Wyllyam Paulet Controler off our Houſe: And off ſpirituall the B. off Hereford, Chycheſter, and Wyncheſter. Now, loke how fare ye be abuſed to recõne that then there wer mo Nobyll men in our preuy Conſell, than now. But yet though I nowe do declare the truthe, to pull yow fro the blyndenes that you wer leddin, yet we enſure we wolde ye knoo, that it appartayneth nothyng to any off oure ſubiects to poynte vs our Conſell, ne we wolde take it ſoo at your hands. Wherfore henſefourth remember better the dutys off Subiects to your King and Souerayne, and meddle not off that whyche ye haue nothyng to do in. And in caſe it be but a falſe and vntrue report (as we verely thynke it is) then it were as mette and ſtandyth as well with iuſtice, that they ſhulde haue the ſelfeſame puniſment whyche wrongfully hath obiectyd thys to them that they ſhulde haue had, if they deſeruyd it. And wõn thyng amonſt others makyth me thynke that thys ſlander ſhulde be vntrw, by cauſe it procedyth frome that plaſe whyche is bothe ſo ferre diſtant frome wher they inhabite, & alſo frome thos peple whyche neuer hard them preche, nor yet knowght any part off theyre conuerſation: Werfore we exorte ye our Commons to be no more ſo lyght off gredit, nother off ill thyngs ſpoken off your kyng & Souerayne, nor yet off any off his Prelats or Conſellers; but to thynke that your Kyng hauing ſoo long raynyd ouer you, hath as good diſcreſſion to elect and cheuſe his Conſellers, as thes hoo euer they be that hath put thys in your hedds.

Here in this fynall poynt whyche ye our Cõmons off Yorkſhire do deſyre it, and alſo in the mator off the hole we verely thynke, that the reſt off our holle Commones (wheroff ye be in maner but an handfull) wyll grettly diſdayne, & nott bere that ye take vppon ye, to ſet order bothe to them and vs your bothe Souerayne, & that (thowght ye be rebelles) you wolde make them as berers and part takers off your myſcheffe, wyllyng them to take pardon for inſurrection, whyche verely I thynke, and dowght nott they neuer myndyd, but like trew ſubiects to the contrary, hathe bothe with hart and dede bene redy att our call to defende bothe vs & themſelfe. And now for our part, as to your demandes, we let you wytt, that pardon of ſuch thyngs as ye demande liett wonly in the wyl & pleaſure off the Prince: But it ſemyth by your leaude Proclamations and ſaue condutes, that there be amongſt you who take vpon them bothe the Kings and Conſellers parts, whyche nother yet by vs, nor by conſent off the Realme, hath bene admytted to any ſuche rome. What arroganſy then is in thos wretches (being alſo off none experiens) to preſume to rayſe ye our ſubiects with owght Commiſſion or auctoryte, ye, and agaynſt vs, vnder a clokyd colur off your wellthe, & in our name: And as the ſucces wyll declare (we benyng no more merſifull then ye hytherto do deſarue) to yours other confuſions. Wherfore we lett you wytt, ye our ſubiects off Yorkſhyre, that were it not that our pryncely hart can nott recõne thys your ſhamfull Inſurrection & vnnaturall rebellyon to be done off malice, or rancore, but rather by a lyghtnes gyffen in a maner by a naghty nature to a Communalte, and a wonderus ſodeyne ſurreption off Gentyllmen, we muſt nedes haue excecuted another maner of puniſhement then (ye humbelyng knowlegyng your faults, and ſubmyttyng your ſelfes to our marcy) we intend to doo. And to the intente that ye ſhal all know, that our Pryncely hart rather inbraſeth (off his awne diſpoſicion) pite & compaſſion off his offending ſubiects, then wyll to be reuenged off theyre naghte deddes, we are contented, yff we may ſee and parſayue in you all a ſorofulnes for your offenſys, and will henſforth to do nere ſoo, nor to beleue ſoo leaude & nawghty tales or reports off your moſt kynd and louyng Prynce, & hys Conſell, to grant vnto you all our Letter Pattens off pardon for this rebellion; ſo that ye will deliuer vnto vs ſhuche off the ryng-leders and prouokers off you to thys rebellion, as wee ſhall aſſyne to yow and poynt. Now note the benyngnyte off your Prince. Now note how eaſely ye maye haue pardone bothe Gentyllmen, and other, yff ye liſt. Now note, how effuſion off blude maye be exchuyd. Now note what thys lytyll wyle off your rebellyon hath hynderyd your ſelfes and Contre. Now lerne by a lytyll lake to exchew a worſe. Now lerne by thys ſmalle warnyng to kepe yow trw men. Thus I as your hed, praye for you my members, that God may light yow with hys grace to knowlege, and declare your ſelfes our trw ſubiects hensforth, and to gyff more credence to thes our benyng parſwaſions, then to the paruarſe inſtigations off malicius diſpoſed parſons.

Fynys.

The effect that the Kings reply wrought, is manifeſt by his free pardons ſent vnto the offenders, by Proclamation diuulged by his meſſenger at Armes and his Trumpet throughout the North parts, the tenour whereof from the Originall is, as followeth.

King Henries free pardon by Proclamation.

All bee it, that yowe the Kings Subiects and Commons dwelling and inhabiting in the Shires of Yorke, Cumberland, Weſtmerland, Northumberland, the Biſhopricke of Durham, the Citty of Yorke, and the Shire of the ſame, the Towne of Kyngſton vpon Hull, and the Shire of the ſame, the Towne of Newcaſtle vpon Tyne, and the Shire of the ſame, and in other Shires, Townes, Dalis, Places priuiledged, the Fraunchiſes and Liberties within the limits of the ſaid Shires, Cities, and Townes, or any of them, or being reputed or taken for any part, parcell or number of any of them, and ſuch other the Kings ſaid Subiects, inhabited in the Towne of Lancaſter, or elſwhere by North, in the Shire of Lancaſter, haue now of late attempted and committed manifeſt and open rebellion, againſt his moſt royall Mageſty, whereby was like to haue enſewde the vtter rewin and diſtruction of thes hole Cuntreis, to the grete comforte and auancement of your awncient enemies the Scots, which as his Hienes is credably enformed, doe with a great Redines wache vpon the ſame, and to the high diſpleaſure of God, who ſtreitely commandeth you to abay your Soueraign Lord and King, in all things, and not with violence to reſiſt his will or Commandement, for any cauſe whatſoeuer it be: Neuertheleſſe the Kings roiall Mageſty, perceiuing as well by the Articles of their partners ſent to his Hyenes: As alſo dewly enformed by credible reports, that their ſaid offences proceeded of ignorance, and by occaſion of ſundrie falſe talis, neuer minded or entended by his Hienes, or any of his Councell, but moſt craftely contriued, and moſt ſpitefully ſet abroade amongs you, by certaine malitious and ſeditious perſons; and thereupon his Hyghnes inclined to extend his moſt gratious mercy and pitty towards you, hauing cheſe charge of you vnder God, both of your ſowles and bodies, and deſiring rather the preſeruation of the ſame, and your reconciliation, by his mercifull meyns, than by the order and rigour of Iuſtice to puniſh you according to your demeryts, of his ineſtimable goodneſſe, benignity, mercy, and pety, and at your moſt humble petitions and ſubmiſſions made vnto his Highneſſe, he is content and plaiſed to gife and grant, and by his preſent Proclamation doth gyue & grant vnto you all, and to al & euerie your confederates whereſoeuer they dwell, of eſtate, degree, or what condition ſoeuer you or they be, or by what name or names ſoeuer they or you be, or may be called, his Generall and free pardon for all manner of treaſons, rebellions, inſurrections, miſpriſions of treaſons, murders, robberies, felons, and of all acceſſaries of the ſame, and of euery of them, vnlawfull aſſembles, vnlawfull Conuenticles, vnlawfull ſpeaking of wordes, confederacies, riots, rowts: And all other treſpaſſes, offencies and contempts, done and committed by you, or anie of you againſt the Kings Mageſtie, his Crowne or dignity roiall, within and from the time of the beginning of the ſaide Rebellion whenſoeuer it was, vnto the preſent day of proclaiming of this Proclamation, and of all paines, iudgements, and executions of death, & all other penalties, forfeitures, fynes, and forfeitures of Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods or Cattels, by any of your forfeitures incurred by reaſon of the premiſes, or any of them; which Fines, Forfeitures, Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods and Cattels, the Kings said Highnes of his speciall grace, and mere motion by these presents giueth to such of you, as haue or should haue forfeited, or loste the same, by occasion of the premisses, or any of them: And also his Highnes is pleased, and contented, that you, and euery of you, from time to time, shall and may haue apon your sewtes to be made hereafter in his Chauncery, his said and most gracious and free pardon vnder his great Seale concerning the premisses, without any further Bill or Warrant to be obtained for the same, and without paying any thing for the great Seale thereof: And that you, and euery of you, from time to time, may freely and liberally sewe for his said pardon, when and as often as it shall like you, without any trouble, vexation or impeachment for the premisses, or any of them, by his heires, or by any his Officiaries, Ministers, or Subiects, by any manner of meanes or in anie manner of wise. Prouided alwaies, that you and euerie of you in token of a perfect declaration and knowledge, that ye doe hartilie lament and be sorrie for your said offencies, shall make your humbly submission vnto his Highnes, in the presence of his right trustie and right intirely beloued Cosens and Concellairs: the Duke of Norfolke, and the Earle of Shrewsburie his Lieutenants Generall, or any of them, or to their Deputy or Deputies of them, or any of them, or such other person, or persons as the Kings Highnes shall appoint for the same: Furthermore, the Kings most roiall Magesty, streitely chargeth and commandeth, that you, & euery of you, shall from henceforth, like trew and faithfull Subiects vse your selues, in Gods peace, and his, according to the dueties of allegeance, and that you shall in no wise hereafter, attempt to make or procure, any such rebellion, intent, vnlawfull Assemblies, Riots, Rowts, and Conspirations, nor at the Commandement, nor by the Authority of any person, of what estate or degree, or for what cause soeuer it be, shall arise in any forcible manner, and array, vnlesse it be at the speciall commandement of the Kings Highnes, or his Lieutenant, sufficiently auctorised for the same. In witnes whereof the Kings most royall Magesty, hath caused this his Proclamation to be made Patent, and sealed with his great Seale at Richemounte the IX. day of December in the XXVIII. yeare of his Reigne. 1536.

Pexsall.

Notwithstanding this Generall pardon and merciful dealings of the King, a new Insurrection was raised in the North, wherein many of the former were now a-gaine Actors, as by name Robert Aske, whom the King had not onely pardoned, but also highly rewarded, the Lord Dacres, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Bygod, Pulmer, Percy, Hamilton, Tempest, and Lumley, all of them put to death, as they well deserued.

(99) In which Commotions those men whose profession was onely the Booke and their Beades, mistaking Christs meaning, who bad his Disciples to sell their coate, and to buy a sword, came armed among the Rebels into the Field, and with them were taken as Traitours against the Crowne: for which offence many of them suffered death: namely, Iohn Paslaw Abbot of Whaley in Lincolnshire, Iohn Castegate, and William Haydocke Monkes of the same house, Robert Hobs Abbot of Woborne in Bedfordshire, Adam Sudbury Abbot of Geruaux, with Astbeed a Monke of that house; the Abbot of Sawley in Lancashire, and the Prior of the same place, William Wold Prior of Birlington, the Parson of Pudington, fiue Priests of Lincolnshire, and with them their Chiefetaine, Captaine Cobler, and Iohn Allen Priest.

(100) These stirres thus quieted, and the Statesmen at leasure to preuent the like, a Commission came forth to purge the Churches of Idols; and to suppresse the Monasteries, to the Kings vse, granted vnto him by Parliament: the one of them the onely working cause, through the gaine that was got by ignorant deuotion, and gadding on pilgrimage, and the other, the Nest and very receptacle of all traiterous attempters against the peace of the Land and Supremacy of the Crowne. The abuse of the first was solemnly shewed at Pauls Crosse in London, vpon Sunday the twenty foure of February, by Doctor Iohn Fisher Bishop of Rochester, where the Roode of Boxley in Kent, commonly called the Roode of Grace (made with diuers vices to bow downe, and to lift vp it selfe, to shake, and to stir both Head, hands, and feet, to rowle the eyes, mooue the lips, and to bend the browes,) was then broken and pulled in pieces. So likewise the Images of our Lady of Walsingham and Ipswich, set and besprinkled with Iewels, and Gemmes, with diuers others both of England and Wales, were brought to London, and burnt at Chelsey before the Lord Crumwell. Then the Axes of the hewers began to cast downe the walles of all Monasteries, whose number (as Cambden doth account them) were six hundred forty fiue, besides foure-score and ten Colledges, them of Oxford and Cambridge not accounted: Of Hospitals one hundred and ten, and of Chaunteries and free Chappels two thousand three hundred seauenty foure, all of them almost were then borne downe with the sudden deluge of those tempestuous times, whilst the world stood amazed, King Henry proceeded, & the Clergy-men groaned vnder their owne destructions: Among these the Shrine of Thomas Becket was defaced, which did abound with more then Princely riches, whose meanest part was pure gold, garnished with many precious stones, as Erasmus that saw it, hath written, whereof the chiefest was a rich Gemme of France, offered by King Lewis, who asked and obtained (you may be sure, he buying it so deare) that no passenger betwixt Douer and Whitesand should perish by shipwracke; his bones by Stephen Langton had been laid in a golden Shrine, his name canonized, and the day of his death made annually holy, such concourse of Pilgrimes, such pressing to touch him, and such creeping and kneeling to his Tombe, that the prints of their deuotion, in the Marble stones, remaines to this day; euery Pillar resounding the miracles of this reputed Martyre, and the Church it selfe dedicated to Christ, forced to giue place to the name of Saint Thomas. The Timberworke of this Shrine was couered with plates of gold, damasked and embossed with wires of gold, garnished with broches, images, angels, precious stones, & great Orient Pearles: all these defaced filled two Chests, and were for price of an vnestimable value. But in steed of these Dagons, the Bible in English was commanded to be read in all Churches, and Register Bookes of weddings, Christenings and Burials in euery of them to be kept.

(101) The yerely reuenues of these, as they were valued by the Commissioners, at their subuersions, amounted to an vnestimable summe, as appeareth by the Originall Booke it selfe, presented to the King, whereof more shall be spoken in the end of this Chapter, and yet most of them rated at Robin-hoods penny-worths, what their rents were, a libell scattered abroad, and read to the King, by demonstration did proue, wherein was accounted, that vnto the fiue Orders of Friers, (euery housholder paying them fiue pence the Quarter) the summe of forty three thousand, three hundred thirty three pound, sixe shillings and eight pence sterling, was paid them by yeare, besides the reuenewes of their owne lands, which was not a little; so that not without cause many entred into a Monasticall life, rather to liue at full, and without cares of this world, then to feede flocke of Christ, or to winne them, and not theirs, after the example of the Apostle. For the Testament of Christ, was vnto most of these, as a booke sealed with seauen seales, and their mouthes vnmuzled they did deuoure, but not tread out the corne, so that the Sunne by their doctrine seemed to be darkned, as with smoake, and themselues to be the Locustes that ouer-spread the superficies of the Earth, whose faces were like men, pretending humanity, their haire like women in shew of modesty, their Crownes of counterfeited gold, signifying their vsurped authority, their teeth like Lyons shewing their Tyranny, their force like Horses prepared for battell, their habergions of Iron betokening their strength, the sound of their wings, t e thundering out their mandates like to the rumbling of Chariots in warre, their Tailes (the false Prophets) hauing stings like vnto Scorpions,

All thoſe alluſions moſt aptly fitting theſe Cloyſtered Friers, who now grown to the height of their ſinnes, their skirts were diſcouered, that their ſhame might appeare; being the onely men then laid open to the world. For, beſides the idle ignorance and voluptuous exceſſe of theſe Cloyſtered votaries, their monaſticall ſenſualities afforded a ſhamefull diſcouery of wicked adulteries and filthy Sodomites: whoſe ſinnes, as they then ſtained the world to their Cells ouerthrowe, ſo let their remembrance ſtaine that religion which debarres the bed of lawfull marriage, and diſpenſeth with ſuch crying and too monſtrous ſins. A Catalogue of whoſe names (if the inke ſtaine not the Paper wherein they ſtand) ſhall ſtand a Record of their filthy ſhame, as long as inke is to be read vpon Paper. Take them then from his teſtimony that tooke them out of an Engliſh Book, containing an Inuentory (or Catalogue) of the villanies diſcouered in the Viſitations of Monaſteries, Couents, Collegiate Churches, and other religious Houſes in England, by command of King Henry the eight; wherein the whoredomes, adulteries, inceſts, and filthy Sodomites of the Monkes, Friers, and Prieſts, both names and ſurnames are written, as followeth.

But ſaith mine Author, the Catalogue of ſuch whoremaſters, and adulterers, is too long to record: for thoſe Cloyſtred Monkes and Friers, from 600 Couents (almoſt) ſcrawling about the land by auricular confeſſion, got into the boſomes of ſimple ſinning women, & defloured the beds of many better men. And the wanton Nunnes likewiſe dalying with them in the arke, brought forth the fruites of darkneſſe, as was found in finding many Infants bones in many of their Cells: Whoſe wickedneſſe (as the Ammonites) being now full, the maule of Gods iuſtice beate downe the walls of their ſhelters, and the ſword of his wrath ſo cut the cords of their ſtrength aſunder, as that Idoll of Rome hath had his crowne cruſhed, and his authority ſhortned in all the Chriſtan world euer ſince.

(102) Againſt theſe and their doctrine in former times (beſides many others in other forreine parts) two in the daies of King Henry the fourth, the firſt Engliſh King that put any to death for the doctrine of Rome; (omitting Sir Iohn Oldcaſtle and others, that died for the Goſpels defence, in the daies of King Henry the fift) foure in the raigne of innocent Henry the ſixt. One in the daies of King Edward the fourth; and ten in the time of K. Henry the ſeuenth, ſealed the doctrine againſt the papall religion with their bloud; all of them being martyred before that Martin Luther wrote. And in the raigne of this King 26. ſuffered the fire, before the flames thereof could bee quenched, which a while was done by the meanes of good Queene Anne, till afterwards they mounted higher, when the ſixe Articles were made: but becauſe this Eccleſiaſticke text is handled elſewhere, and ſeemeth vnſociable to our begun Subiect, we will referre the Reader for theſe matters vnto the induſtrious paines of that worthy and euer-venerable man Mr. Fox, taken in his Acts and Monuments of Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtory.

Many ſuffered death for the Goſpell before that Martin Luther wrote.

(103) The Monaſteries thus diſſolued, and the reuenewes therof conuerted to temporall vſes, K. Henry ran in great obloquie of many forrain Potentates, but moſt eſpecially of the Pope; who with Card. Poole inſtigated diuers Princes in Chriſtendome to inuade England, thus fallen from his faith: Yea, and home-borne Subiects diſliking the courſe for Papiſticall ſubuerſion, by ſecret working ſought to depriue King Henry, and to raiſe vp Reynold Poole vnto the Regall dignity, as by their inditements appeareth. The perſons conuicted, were L. Henry Courtney Marqueſſe of Exceſter, & Earle of Deuonſhire, the ſon of L. Katherine, the ſeauenth daughter of K. Edward the fourth. Henry Poole Lord Montacute, with Sr. Geffrey his brother, & Sr. Edward Neuill brother to the L. of Abergauenny. Theſe Pooles were the ſons of L. Margaret Counteſſe of Salisbury, the only daughter of George Duke of Clarence: and of theſe Reinold Poole once Deane of Exceſter, and now Cardinall at Rome, was accounted the onely man.

(104) And this foreſaid Lord Marqueſſe had formerly been in ſuch fauour with K. Henry, that at his going into France he ordained him his heire-apparant, though at his return, vpon graue deliberation, he ſaw it better policy to pluck him downe then was vſed in ſetting him vp, leſt in acting his part vpon that infectiue ſtage, he put the land to as much trouble as the arreared D. Richard of Yorke had done, after he was ordained heire-apparant, which Title produced the Tragedy of his raiſer K. Henry the ſixt, and now hauing him and his Abbeters vpon the aduantage, the better to ſecure his own Eſtate, he cauſed the heads of this Lord Marqueſſe, with the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Neuill to be cut off vpon Tower-hill.

But whether Fredericke for the death of Anne Bullen, or that he would haue his wiues ſiſter beſtowed neerer at home (which thing he pretended) a great hinderer he was of that match. But the Lady ſent into England, and married vnto K. Henry, ſeemed nothing pleaſing in his eye; which Stephen Gardiner then Biſhop of Wincheſter perceiuing, thought it a fit ſubiect for him to worke vpon, againſt the L. Cromwell the maker of the match; he therefore inſtigated iealouſies daily into the Kings eare; firſt exaſperating the hatred of the Princes of Germany to him-wards, and eſpecially of D. Fredericke his compulſiue brother in Law,

The Lord Cromwell was charged by the Lord Rich, and Sir George Throgmorton, with ſpeaking of certain generall words, not excepting therein the Kings perſon, which neuertheleſſe were thought ſo ſleight and inſufficient to take away his life, that his enemies feared to put it to the triall of his Peeres, leſt he ſhould be acquitted by them, as the Lord Dacres of the North not many yeares before had beene; wherefore there was a Bill drawne to attaint him of hereſie and Treaſon, in general words, rather then in particular proofes, which when he was dead, paſſed in both Houſes of Parliament with the Kings aſſent.

Of Anne we haue ſeene what hath beene ſaid, and of this Queene let vs heare what ſhe proteſted after her condemnation to Doctor White Biſhop of Wincheſter, her laſt Confeſſor, and by him deliuered to a noble young Lord of her name, and neere alliance: Her words were theſe: As to the Act my reuerend Lord for which I ſtand condemned, God and his holy Angels I take to witneſſe vpon my ſoules ſaluation, that I die guiltleſſe, neuer hauing ſo abuſed my Soueraignes bed: what other ſins and follies of youth I haue committed, I will not excuſe; but am aſſured that for them God hath brought this puniſhment vpon mee, and will in his mercy remit them, for which I pray you, pray with me, vnto his ſonne, and my Sauiour Chriſt.

This young heifer (saith he) abiding no yoake, a coy dame, and of very euill fame, left the company of Master Kyme, to gad vp and downe a Gospelling and Gossipping where she might, and ought not, but especially in London, and neere the Court, now she being faire and but twenty fiue yeares old at her death, doth easily shew what may be suspected of her life, and the mysticall speeches and demands of the Kings Councel touching her departure from her husband, were grounded vpon somewhat, especially in that shee called her selfe Anne Askew, alias Kyme. Thus farre this scandalizing man hath accused this holy Anne, by the outward appearance of her youth and beauty: as holy Anna, by Eli, was accused of drunkennesse when her heart was most feruent, in supplications to her God; and his partiall pen, made the Fan to sift the Wheat of her holy conuersation to find out some Chaffe, whereof none is free, nor is she to be condemned vpon the imagerie of his suspicious head (who vndoubtedly would haue told all if any thing could haue beene found) whereas she in the vigour of beauty and weakenesse of her Sexe, resisted the gaine-sayers of the truth with her deerest bloud: testifying from the Prisons her faith and constancy, and from the Racke preached Christ, whereon most vnhumanely and against kinde, she was twice tormented; and lastly, sealed her testimony in Smithfield, through the flames of fire: being borne to the place of her death in a Chaire, her bones so disjoynted by the Racke that she could not goe.

(113) The irreuerend * N.D. whose affection to Christs Gospell and loyalty to the English Crowne hath sufficiently shewed it selfe, to make her no Martyr, and that her life did demerit the Racke, saith that the King himselfe commanded that torture to be inflicted, for infecting with her erroneous doctrine, his Court, his Neeces, Suffolkes Daughters, and his Queene. Whereas the truth tels vs, that the Lieutenant refusing to racke her the second time, was threatned by Wriotheseley Lord Chancellor (who did it himselfe) to be complained of to the King, who immediately tooke Boate, and told the whole Tragedy; whereof King Henry seemed to be sore offended, for vsing a Woman with such inhumane tortures. But such fauours had the Popes Chickens vnder the shroud of the Church, and wing of this Monarch, that they feared not to follow the appeale of death, euen vpon her that slept in his owne bosome, which was Queene Katherine Parre, espoused vnto him some three yeares before, and whom (as this States intelligencer doth confesse) he meant to haue burned had he longer liued. For the truth is (saith hee) that the Kings sickenesse and death shortly ensuing was the chiefe cause of her escape; and the error of the Lord Chancellor, Wriotheseley, who let fall out of his bosome the Kings hand and Commission for carrying her to the Tower, gaue occasion (the paper found and brought her) to goe and humble her selfe to the King; the principall occasion against her, was Hereticall Bookes, found in her closet, both brought and sent her by Anne Askew, whereof the witnesses were the Lady Herbert, Lady Iane, Lady Tyawit, and others. Indeed it is true that by Gods prouidence such papers were let fall out of the Lord Chancellors bosome, containing certain articles against her, with a warrant to commit her to the Tower, whereunto the Kings hand was subscribed: which being found, was presently brought vnto the Queene, whereof the vnexpected content so deepely touched her tender heart, that forthwith shee fell into great feares, laments, and a most heauy melancholy, and was in such danger of death, that the King came to visit her, hauing not gone forth of his Chamber of many daies before; whereat she so rejoyced, as she began to amend: and to acknowledge her like loue and duty, the next night following, repayred to the Kings Bed-chamber, accompanied onely with the Lady Herbert her sister, and the Lady Iane the Kings neece, carrying the Candle before her, of whose presence the King seemed to be most desirous; and presently falling in talke of Religion, began to debate some question thereof with the Queene, demanding to haue her resolutions therein; but she knowing that his nature was not to be crost, and the soreneesse of his legge to encrease his choller, made him answere, that she was a woman, accompanied with many imperfections, but his Maiesty wise and iudicious, of whom she must learne, as of her Lord and Head, for so God hath appointed you (said she) the Supreame Head of vs all, of whom next vnto him I will euer learne. Not so, by Saint Mary, said the King, you are become a Doctor Kate to instruct vs, and not to be instructed by vs, as often heretofore we haue seene. Indeed (said she) if your Maiesty haue so conceiued, I haue beene mistaken in my meaning, who haue euer held it preposterous for a woman to instruct her Lord. And whereas I haue heretofore held talke with your highnesse touching Religion, it was to learne of your Maiesty some excellent point which my selfe stood in doubt of: and sometimes to the end that you might with lesse griefe passe ouer this painfull time of your infirmity, wherein if by my ouer-much boldnesse I haue failed in the latter, yet haue I not done in the former, to my no small benefit and comfort. And is it euen so sweet heart? (quoth the King,) why then, are we friends, and so kissing her, gaue her leaue to depart. But the day drawne on for her apprehension, and the King disposed to take the ayre, sent for the Queene to walke in the garden, himselfe accompanied onely with two Gentlemen, and she with the three foresaid Ladies. When as suddenly the Lord Chancellor with forty of the guard, came into the garden, with purpose to haue apprehended and carried the Queene to the Tower; whose malepert approach the King greatly misliked, and sternely beholding him, stept aside, saluting him with the names of knaue, foole, and beast, bidding auaunt out of presence. The Queene seeing the King chafed, but knew not the cause, indeauoured by all meanes to pacifie his Majestie, and intreated for the Lord Chancellour, whose fault as she thought and alledged was rather through misimprision then will, and therefore, said she, I will become an humble suiter for him vnto your Highnesse. Ah poore Soule (quoth the King) thou little knowest Kate how euill he deserueth this grace at thy hands: of my word (sweet heart) he hath beene towards thee a very knaue. But in following this tract of bloud, flowed from the fountaine of the sixe Articles, we haue stepped ouer some other occurrences that happened somewhat before this time; vnto which with thy patience, good Reader, we will returne againe.

An. D. 1542.

(115) The vnkindneſſe growing from this ſmall ſparke, was preſently kindled into great flames, for Commiſſioners being ſent from both Kings, to view the limits of either Kingdome, they fell at ods about a ſmall peece of ground, and from that tooke occaſion of emulations and warres: to proſecute which, King Henry prepared an army, and ſent them into Scotland vnder the conduct of the Duke of Norfolke, accompanied with the Earles of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angus, and Rutland. Theſe, paſſing the Engliſh Marches, did much hurt in the kingdome of Scotland. To withſtand whom, King Iames gathered a power of fiue and thirty thouſand ſtrong, & at Fallaw moore, meant to haue bidden the Duke battell, which as that Writer related, was not then minded to doe, but made againe into England, and paſſing the water Tweed, ſuſtained great loſſe by the couragious purſuit of the L. Huntly. King Iames vpon a luſty courage, meaning to repaire the Scots loſſes with the Engliſh ſpoyles, was very forward to follow the Duke into their borders, but the Scottiſh Nobility wiſely waying the danger of war, by no meanes would either aſſent or aſſiſt him out of his owne kingdome, affirming it honour ſufficient, to haue forced the Engliſh backe with no little loſſe.

The Scottiſh noblemen refuſe to inuade England.

(116) King Iames diſcontented at his Nobles denials, made towards the borders himſelfe, where, mouing the Lord Maxewell, Lord Warden of the Weſt Borders, with many other men of ſpeciall fauour and account, to inuade England, they gaue their conſents. Theſe, paſſing the Riuer Eske, did ſome ſmall dammage vpon the Weſterne Borderers, whereof Thomas Baſtard Dacres, and * Iacke of Muſgraue, as Holinſhead cals them, ſent word to Thomas Wharton, Lord Warden for the King vpon the Weſt-Marches: But the Scots comming forward, they were forced to prepare for fight before the Lord Wharton could come, and out of their ſmall company left a ſtand vpon the ſide of a hill.

The death of K. Iames of Scotland.

(119) Newes brought neere at one inſtant, of the death of King Iames, and birth of the Princeſſe his Daughter, King Henrie intended to doe that by the match of a marriage, which long had beene aſſayed by the Sword of Mars: all things ſo conſorting as it did, he hauing one onely ſonne, then aboue fiue yeares of age, and Scotland no heire beſide this new-borne daughter; their yeares ſuiting a conſent for marriage, the whole Iland offering both the joynter and dowry, and that which moſt moued, their chiefe Nobility in his owne hands, to be moulded for this deſigne, as if heauen it ſelfe had bid the banes.

A marriage intended betwixt Prince Edward, and the young Queene of Scotland.

(120) Thoſe Priſoners therefore which had remained in the Tower onely two daies, vpon the twenty-one of December, he ſent for to Weſtminſter, the Earles and Lords all ſuited in gownes of blacke damaske, furred with Cunny, where, after ſome words of friendly reproofe, they were beſtowed among the Engliſh Nobility, who vſed them according to their eſtates: and the third day, in Chriſtmas, were inuited to the Court at Greenewich, where they went before the King to his Chappell, were royally feaſted, and the motion then made for the eſtabliſhing of peace, by the conjunction of the two Princes, whereunto the Scottiſh were as willing as the Engliſh, and proffered all forward aſſiſtance to haue it accompliſhed. So that theſe Nobles were deliuered without other ranſome, and richly rewarded at their departure from Court.

(121) Theſe returned into Scotland, declared what they had done, and ſo effectually followed the buſineſſe, that in a Parliament aſſembled of the three Eſtates, the marriage was confirmed, and a peace proclaimed to continue betwixt the two realmes the ſpace of ten yeares, which agreements were ſent into England by honourable Ambaſſadours, and there interchangeably ſealed betwixt theſe Potent Eſtates. But Cardinall Beton Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes, fearing leaſt Scotland would change the Church Orders, as England had done (the Bible already read in their owne language, and the Popes vſurped power called in Queſtion, as then it began to be, by the feruent preaching of Frier Guliam, to the great liking of moſt of the Lords) made ſome exceptions againſt the Earle Arraine the new-choſen Gouernour, being neereſt in bloud to the young Queene. And the French King not liking this vnion with England, ſought by all meanes to breake the ſame match: to effect which, he ſent the Earle of Lennox to perſwade with the Gouernour, with great proffers and promiſes of aſſiſtance, but finding him faithful vnto King Henry, preſently made faction for the French, wherein he drew the Queene-Mother, the Earles Huntly, Argile, Montroſſe, Menteith, and many more Peeres, the Cardinall amongſt them euer the chiefe.

An Army sent into Scotland.

no waies would be granted, and thereupon he prepared an army thitherward, vnder the conduct of Lord Edward Seimer Earle of Hertford, Lieutenant-General by Land, accompanied with the Earle of Shrewsbury, and a Fleete of two hundred saile by Sea, whereof Sir Iohn Dudley, Vicount Liſle, was Admirall.

Iohn Leſſie. The Pope, and French-King ſend ayde into Scotland.

(124) To the ayde of the Scots, the Popes Holineſſe was very forward, who ſent them the Patriarch of Venice as his Legate, and Orator, to perſwade their Reſolutions; with whom the French King ſent Monſieur la Broche, and Monſieur Menager, to lead them to fight, and fifty thouſand Crownes of the Sunne, to ſuſtaine the Charge; with munition worth ten thouſand Crownes more. It ſeemeth by Leſly that part of this ſiluer fell into the Earle Lennox his hand, and that therewith he made head againſt the Gouernor, but not able to match him, ſent vnto King Henry for aide, with proffer of his ſeruice againſt the French ſide, which ſo well was accepted of Henry, as he made him his Nephew, by giuing the Lady Margaret his ſiſters daughter to be his Wife.

Matth. Earle of Lennox marrieth Lady Margaret.

(125) The Engliſh thus ſeconded with this vnlooked-for alliance, Cardinall Beton thought good to bind all to the Gouernour, who with the authority of the Queene Dowager, proclaymed Lennox an Enemy to the State. But in the meane-while the Admirall of England was entred the Frith, and at New-Hauen landed his men, where joyning his, to the Land-Seruice, they all together marched thence toward Lieth, himſelfe leading the Vaward, Shrewsbury the Rereward, and the Lord Lieutenant the maine Battel. Theſe comming to Lieth, ſpoyled the Towne, and thence to Edenbrough, burnt the City, and waſted the Country for ſeauen miles about; this done, they ſet fire vpon Haddington, and Dunbarre, and then the whole Army returned vnto Barwicke.

Earle Lennox proclaymed an enemy to the State.

An.D. 1544.

(126) Whilſt things thus paſſed in Scotland, and the maine purpoſe reſting in ſuſpence, King Henry well knew where the greateſt rub did lie in his way, which was the French King, the chiefeſt Abetter of the Scots, whom he euer vphel[d], to hold him tacke at home, leſt otherwiſe he ſhould tugge with France for his owne right. And therefore hauing joyned with the Emperour againſt the French, ſent his Herald, Garter, King at Armes, to demand certaine couenants, which if he refuſed, to proclaime defiance vnto open warres, but he not ſuffered to doe his meſſage to the King, returned, and Henry prepared an expedition into France, wherein he imployed the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, and Surrey, the Lords, Ruſſell, Grey, Ferrers, Mountjoy, and Sainct-Iohn, beſides many other ſeruiceable Knights, and Sir Iohn Dudley appointed high Admirall for the Seas. Of theſe ſome joyned with the Emperials, and ſhewed their value in the ſiege of Mattrell.

Defiance ſent into France.

Iob. Stow.

Bolloigne beſieged.

(127) The Duke of Suffolke in the meane while ſtrucke downe his Standards on the Eaſt ſide of Bolloigne, and with many ſharpe skirmiſhes, entred the baſe-Towne, which ſiege King Henry himſelfe in perſon ſeconded, who hauing paſſed the Seas from England, vpon the ſixe and twentieth of Iuly, encamped before Bolloigne on the Eaſt-ſide, whence his Canons ſo rent the Wals and Bulwarke, as their mounted tops lay vpon the Ground, and his great morter-peeces were diſcharged with ſo skilfull a compaſſe, that their bullets falling downe-right, beat all buildings downe vpon the Enemies heads. Whereby (ſaith Sleidane) in ſhort time he got that, which neither his Father, nor the Kings in former times could neuer win. For thereupon the Towne was ſurrendred and cleared of the French ſouldiers, women, and chi[l]dren.

Iohn Sleidan. Comment.

Bolloigne wonne.

(128) The King like a Conquerour with his ſword borne before him entred the Gate, where the Duke of Suffolke preſented him with the keyes of the Towne, the Trumpets ſtill ſounding, and nothing wanting that might applaud his fame. The town thus won, the Engliſh meant ſtill to keepe; for the ſtrengthening whereof, the King commanded the faire Church of S[t]. Maries to be taken downe, and in the ſame place, a mount to be raiſed for the planting of Ordnance, to annoy any ſiege. But being thus buſied in Bolloignes affaires, the Emperour, without his knowledge or conſent, came to a peace with the French King, whereat King Henry was ſore diſpleaſed, and the ſooner left France, leauing Sir Iohn Dudley Lord Liſle, his deputy in Bolloigne, and landed at Douer the firſt day of October, to his great honor, and joy of his Subiects.

R. Greſton.

(129) The French King chafed with this late and great loſſe, ſought to try fortune in further attempts, and that not onely for the recouery of Bolloigne, (which with twenty-thouſand well appointed he aſſayed) but alſo in aſſayling the Engliſh dominions, as the Ile of Wight, and thoſe parts of Suſſex that lay vpon the Seas, though with loſſe of many Captaines and thouſands of Souldiers, that neuer returned to tell him what intertainement they had; as likewiſe in ſending ayde vnto Scotland, where Monſieur Mungumry of the Order of France, with 5000. ſtrong, entred to maintaine the breach betwixt them and King Henry, which was ſo followed on both parts, as the Engliſh making a Roade towards Gedworth, got praiſe for their valour, but reproach for their ſpoyles, and the Scots renowne for killing the Lord Eure, Lord Warden of the Eaſt-Marches, with many other Captaines in defence of their Countrey.

Iohn Serres.

The French inuade the Ile of Wight and the coaſts of Suſſex.

Lord Eure ſlaine.

(130) Hereupon an Army of twelue thouſand ſtrong was ſent into Scotland, whereof the Earle of Hertford was Generall: with theſe hee forraged the Borders before him, and burnt many Townes in the Middle-Marches, with Kelſey and Coldingham-Abbey, the French not haſty to ſtay the incurſion, lay ſtil, and let them (vnfought with) depart for England.

An.D. 1546.

(131) But the warres remoued againe into France, the Reingraue with a great power came to victuall a Fort built neere vnto Bolloigne; to impeach which, the Earle of Surrey, then Lieutenant of the Towne, made forth, but was diſcomfited in the enterprize, and Sir Edward Poynings, Captaine of a Band, ſlaine, with fifteene other Captaines, beſides many Officers and common Souldiers. Theſe Princes wars in theſe violent proceedings, became very fearefull leſt they would grow to the common hurt of Chriſtendome, and therfore many other Potentates, whereof the Emperour was firſt, ſollicited theſe Kings vnto a peace, which the ſooner was heard and imbraced, for that they were both of them olde, and King Henry diſeaſed in body. Commiſſioners therefore appointed, certaine articles were agreed vpon: the firſt thereof was, that the French King ſhould pay vnto King Henry, eight hundred-thouſand Crownes in eight yeares ſpace, and then to re-enter vpon Bolloigne, but in the meantime it to remaine vnder the Engliſh; to accompliſh which peace, Mounſieur Danebalt, high Admirall of France, was ſent into England; and Sir Thomas Cheynie, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, to be the Kings Agent at the Font, for the Baptiſme of the Dolphins new-borne Daughter.

A great loſſe of Engliſh in France.

Iohn Sleidan. Com. lib. 7.

Peace concluded betwixt England and France.

(132) Notwithſtanding theſe complements, the ſight of Bolloigne was a great ſore in the Frenchmens eyes, inſomuch that Monſieur Chatillon, Captaine of Mountplaiſier, began to make a new Baſtilion neere vnto the Towne, euen in the very mouth of the Riuer; which the Lord Grey of Wilton perceyuing, certified the King, what inconuenience would happen if that were made ſtrong, and the ſame diſcuſſed at the Councell-Table, it paſſed with one voyce that the Peace with France was not to be infringed, notwithſtanding this French attempt: to which end a prohibition was drawne, (whereunto King Henry alſo ſet his hand,) that no let ſhould be made againſt Chatillon in his Fort. Howbeit the King commaunded Sir Thomas Palmer (imployed in this buſineſſe) to bid the Lord Grey to impeach the new worke, and to flat ſo much as was rayſed thereof vnto the Earth. This Commiſſion read, with the report of Commaund to the Contrary, the Counſell of State, thought it moſt meete to follow their inſtructions in writing, leaſt the words might eyther be miſ-deliuered or miſtaken. But the Lord Grey, cauſing the meſſengers words to be writ, and ſubſcribed with all their hands that that were preſent at the report, ſuddainely and vnlooked for, came to the Fort, and in foure houres ſpace caſt downe, what had beene in raiſing three moneths before, which when the King heard off, he asked his Councellors what they thought of this, that Chatillon-garden was caſt downe? amongſt whom one of them anſwered, the doer thereof was worthy to looſe his head; I had rather (ſaid the King) looſe a dozen of ſuch heads as thine is, then his that had done the deed, and immediately ſent the Lord Grey his pardon, with many great thankes.

King Henries death.

And in great penitency for his ſinnes, dyed vpon Thurſday the twenty eight day of Ianuary, in the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus 1546. when he had raigned thirty ſeauen yeare, nine moneths, and fiue daies, and had liued fifty fiue yeres, fiue moneths, and fiue daies, whoſe body with great ſolemnity was buried at Windſore, vnder a moſt coſtly and ſtately Tombe, begun in Copper and guilt, but neuer finiſhed, in the incloſures of whoſe Grates is curiouſly caſt this Inſcription. HENRICVS OCTAVVS REX ANGLIAE, FRANCIAE, DOMINVS HIBERNIAE, FIDEI DEFENSOR: With what coſt and ſtate this his monument was intended, is manifeſted by a Manuſcript taken from the true modell thereof, which I receiued from that induſtrious Harald Maſter Nicholas Charles Lancaſter, and for the great magnificence is worthy here to be inſerted.

The manner of the Tombe to be made for the Kings Grace at Windſore.

Firſt, the Pauement whereupon the Tombe ſhall ſtand, ſhall be of Orientall ſtone: That is to ſay, of Alabaſter, Porfido, Serpentines, and other ſtones of diuers colours, as in the patterne is ſhewed.

Item, vpon the ſame Pauement ſhall be two great ſteps vnder all the worke, of like Orientall ſtones.

Item, the Baſement of the Pillars ſhall be of white marble, with Angels holding between them Crownes or Garlands guilt, as more plainely ſheweth in the Patterne.

Item, aboue the ſaid Baſement and Angels, ſhall be all the old Teſtament, that is to ſay, xiiij. Images in the xiiij. Caſements of the ſame two Pillars of the Prophets, and all the Pillars which ſhall be xvi. ſhall be of ſtones Serpentine, Porfido, and Alabaſter, and other fine Orientall ſtones, of ſuch colours as is ſhewed in the patterne; and the foot of euery pillar, and alſo the head ſhall be of Braſſe. And euery Prophet ſhall haue an Angell ſit at his foot, with Scripture of the name of his Prophet, and aboue ouer the head of the ſame ſhall be the ſtory of his Prophet: in euery of which ſtory ſhall be at leaſt viij. or xi. figures.

Item, aboue all the ſame pillars ſhall be another Baſement of white marble, with a partition being made of ſuch fine Orientall ſtones as the pillars be, wherein ſhall be written ſuch Scripture as pleaſe you.

Item, aboue the ſame Baſement ſhall be the ſtory of the new Teſtament, that is to wit, with the Images of the Apoſtles, the Euangeliſts, and the foure Doctors of the Church, and euery Image ſhall haue ſitting at his foote a little childe, with a Scripture of the name of his Image, and a little Easket full of red and white Roſes, which they ſhall ſhew to take in their hands, and caſt them downe off the Tombe, and ouer the Pauement, and the Roſes that they ſhall caſt ouer the Tombe, ſhall be enamelled and guilt, and the Roſes that they caſt ouer the Pauements ſhall be of fine Orientall ſtones of white and red.

Item, behinde all the ſame Images of the new Teſtament round about, ſhall be made in braſſe and guilt all the life of Ieſus Chriſt from the natiuity to his aſcention, and it ſhall be ſo clearely and perfectly made, that the Myſtery of Chriſts life to his aſcention ſhall plainely appeare.

Item, aboue the ſaid new Teſtament and Images thereof, and aboue the ſaid life of Chriſt, ſhall be a Quire of xx. Angels ſtanding vpon a Baſement of white Marble, with great Candleſtickes in their hands hauing lights in them ſhewing to honor and reuerence the ſame Tombe.

Item, all theſe foreſaid figures, ſtories, and ornaments ſhall be made to garniſh and ornate the two Pillars of the Church betweene which the Tombe ſhall be ſet.

Item, betweene the ſaid two great Pillars of the Church thus garniſhed, ſhall be a Baſement of white Marble of the height of the Baſement of the Pillars, and therein the Epitaph of the King and Queene, with letters of gold, of ſuch Scriptures as ye deuiſe.

Item, vpon the ſame Baſement ſhall be made two Tombes of blacke-Touch, that is to ſay, on eyther ſide one, and vpon the ſaid Tombes of blacke Touch ſhall be made the Image of the King and Queene on both ſides, not as death, but as perſons ſleeping, becauſe to ſhew that famous Princes leauing behinde them great fame, their names neuer doe die, and ſhall lie in royall Apparels after the antique maner.

Item, ouer the right hand, ouer both the ſides of the ſame Tombe ſhall be an Angell which ſhall hold the Kings Armes, with a great Candlesticke, hauing as it were light on it as a Lampe, and in like manner shall be an other Angell holding the Queenes Armes on the left hand with a like Candlesticke.

Item, on the right hand and left hand on both the sides ouer the said Images of the King and Queene, shall be two Angels, shewing to the people the bodies of the King and Queene, holding aboue their Heads veiles of Gold, and the Crownes of the King and Queene on their hands.

Item, betweene the said two Tombes of blacke Touch, and the said Angel ouer the King and Queene, shall stand an high Basement like a Sepulchre, and on the sides whereof shall be made the story of S*t*. George, and ouer the height of the Basement shall be made an Image of the King on Horse-backe, liuely in Armour like a King, after the antique manner, shewing in countenance and looking on the said two Images lying on the said Tombes.

Item, on the right hand and left hand of the said two Tombes shall be foure Pillers of the foresaid Orientall stones, that is to say, on either side two Pillers, and vpon euery Piller shall be a like Basement of white Marble with partitions for Scriptures as shall be aboue the other Pillers. And on the same foure Basements of the said Pillers shall be made foure Images, two of Saint Iohn Baptist, and two of S*t*. George, with foure little Children by them, casting roses, as is aforesaid.

Item, ouer the said Image of the King on horseback shall be made an Arch triumphall, of white Marble wrought within, and about it, and vpon the same arch, in manner of a Casement of white Marble, garnished with like Orientall Stones of diuers colours, as the patterne sheweth, and on the two sides of the saide Casement shall be made and set of brasse guilt, the story of the life of Saint Iohn Baptist, and one height of the said Casement shall be made fiue steps, euery one more then other downeward, of like Orientall stones, as the said Pillers shall shew.

Item, on the foure corners of the said Casement shall be made the Images of the foure Cardinall vertues, hauing such Candlestickes in their hands as is aboue-said.

Item, on the top of the highest step of the said fiue steps, on the one side, shall be an Image of the Father, hauing in his left hand the Soule of the King, and blessing with his right hand, with two Angels holding abroad the Mantle of the Father on either side.

Item, in like wise shal be made, on the other side, the said image of the Father, hauing the soule of the Queen in his left hand, blessing with his right hand with like Angels.

The height of the same worke from the Father vnto the Pauement shall be xxviij. foot.

Item, the breadth and largenesse of the said worke shall be xv. foot, and the Pillers of the Church in greatnesse, v. foote: and so the largenesse of the said worke, from the vttermost part of the two great Pillars shall be xx. foote.

Item, euery of the Images of the xiiij. Prophets, shall containe euery Image V. foot in length, and the Angels shall containe two foot and a halfe in length.

Item, euery of the xx. Pillers shall containe in length X. foote.

Item, euery of the Images of the Apostles, Euangelists, and Doctors shall containe in length V. foote and the Angels as is abouesaid.

Item, in likewise euery of the xx. Angels of the quire shall containe in length two foot and a halfe, and in likewise the Images of the Children two foot and a halfe.

Item, the foure Images of S*t*. Iohn Baptist and Saint George, and all the figures of the Father and Angels on the V. steps shall be V. foot.

Item, the foure Images of the King and the Queene shall be of the stature of a man and woman, and the foure Angels by them of the stature of a man euery one.

Item, the Image of the King on Horse-backe with his Horse shal be of the whole stature of a goodly man and large Horse.

Item, there shall be a Cxxxiiij, figures, Xliij. Stories, and all of Brasse guilt, as in the patterne appeareth.

(135) But, Sic transit gloria mundi; For howsoeuer this Kings fame was thus intended, yet that great work neuer came to perfection; but standeth as a Monument, how Kings, as other mortals are, but dust and ashes, when the breath of life in them is dissolued, as the wisest of Kings hath left vpon record in Ecclesiastes the ninth. This magnificent Monarch was of presence Majesticall, and of Personage more then ordinarily tall, faire of Complexion and corpulent of body, very wise, and very well learned, of a sudden and ready speech, in youth very prodigall, and in his age very liberall, pleasant, and affable, but not to be dallied with, bold in attempting, and euer thirstie of potent glory: an expert Souldier, and fauouring such as were actiue or seruiceable, according to the then vsuall saying, King Henry loues a man: and indeed somewhat too well the delights with women, as by his many wiues here ensuing may well appeare.

His Wiues.

(136) Katherine the first wife to King Henry, was the daughter of Ferdinando the sixt King of Spaine, and widdow-dowager of Prince Arthur his elder brother, as hath bin said: she was married vnto this King the third of Iune: and first of his Raigne, the yeere of Saluation 1509. being solemnely crowned with him vpon the twenty-fourth day of the same, and was his wife aboue twenty yeares, and then diuorced from him by the sentence of the Archbishop of Canterbury; liued three yeares after by the name of Katherine Dowager. She deceased at Kimbalton in the County of Huntington the eight of Ianuary, and yeare of Christ 1535. and lyeth interred on the North-side of the quire in the Cathedrall Church of Peterborow, vnder a hearse of Blacke Saye, hauing a white Crosse in the middest. An.D. 1533.

(137) Anne, the second wife of King Henry, was the second daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earle of Wiltshire and Ormond. She was solemnely at Windsor created Marchionesse of Pembrooke, the first of September, and twenty foure of his Raigne, hauing one thousand pound giuen her by yeare, to maintaine her estate. She was married vnto King Henry in his Closet at White-Hal, vpon the twenty-fift day of Ianuary, and yeare of Christ Iesus 1533. being the foure and twentieth of his raigne, and was crowned with all due obseruances at Westminster vpon Whitsunday the first of Iune, where the Crowne of Saint Edward was set vpon her head, the Scepter of Gold deliuered into her right hand, and the Iuory-rod, with the Doue, into her left. She was his wife three yeares, three moneths, and twenty fiue daies, when being cut off by the sword the nineteenth of May, her body was buried in the Quire of the Chappell in the Tower, leauing her accused fame to be censured as affections best pleased the vncharitable minded, and her bed to be possest of a vertuous Lady. An.D. 1532. An.D. 1536.

(138) Iane, the third wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Iohn Seimer Knight, and sister to Lord Edward Seimer, Earle of Hertford, and Duke of Sommerset. She was married vnto him the twentieth of May, euen the next day after the beheading of Queene Anne, and the twenty eight of his Raigne. She was his wife one yeare, fiue moneths, and twenty foure dayes, and died in Child-bed the foureteenth of October, to the great griefe of the King, who not onely remoued from the place, but kept himselfe priuate, and wore the Garment of mourning euen in the Festiuall time of Christmas; her body was solemnely conueied to Windsore the eight of Nouember following, where she was interred in the middest of the Quire of the Church within the Castell.

(139) Anne, the fourth wife of King Henry, and sister to William Duke of Cleue, was married vnto him the sixth of Ianuary, in the thirty one yeare of his Raigne, the yeare of Grace 1540. she was his Wife An.D. 1540.

sixe moneths, after which time certaine Lords of the vpper House of Parliament came into the nether, and alledged cause for which that marriage was vnlawful, whereupon she was diuorced, and by Statute enacted, that she should no more be taken for Queene, but should be called the Lady Anne of Cleue. She remained in England long after the Kings death, though small mention is made of her by any of our Writers, onely we finde that she accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London at the solemnizing of Queene Maries Coronation.

(140) Katherine, the fifth Wife of King Henrie the eight, was the daughter of Edmund, and Neece vnto Thomas Howard his brother, Duke of Norfolke: She was married vnto him the eight of August, and yeare of Grace 1540. being the thirtie two of his Raigne, at Hampton-Court, and continued his Queene the space of one yeare, sixe moneths, and foure dayes, when for her vnchast life, she was attainted by Parliament, and for the same beheaded within the Tower of London the twelfth of February, and her body buried in the Chauncell of the Chappell by Queene Anne Bullen.

(141) Katherine, the sixth and last wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kendall, and sister to Lord William Parre Marquesse of Northampton: She was first married to Iohn Neuill, Lord Latimer, and after his decease, vpon the twelfth of Iuly married vnto the King at Hampton-Court, the yeare of Saluation 1543. and thirty fiue of his raigne: She was his wife three yeares, sixe moneths, and fiue daies, and suruiuing him, was againe married vnto Thomas Seimer Lord Admirall of England, vnto whom she bare a daughter, but died in the same Childbed, the yeare of Grace 1548.

His Issue.

(142) Henrie, the first sonne of King Henrie by Queene Katherine his first Wife, was borne at Richmond in Surrey, vpon the first of Ianuary, & the first of his fathers raigne, whose Godfathers at the Font were the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury Will. Warham, and the Earle of Surrey: his Godmother Lady Katherine, Countesse of Deuonshire, daughter to King Edward the fourth. This Prince liued not fully two moneths, but died in the same place wherein he was born, vpon the two and twentieth of February, and his body with all due obsequies buried in Westminster.

(143) A Son not named was borne vnto King Henry by Lady Katherine, his first Queene, in the moneth of Nouember, and the sixth yeare of his raigne, who liued not long, and therfore no further mention of him can be made: the deaths of these Princes King Henry tooke as a punishment from God, for so he alledged it in the publike Court held in Blacke-Friers London, they being begot on his owne brothers wife.

(144) Marie, the third childe and first daughter of King Henrie by Queene Katherine his first wife, was borne at Greenewich in Kent, the eighteenth of February, in the yeare of Christs humanity 1518. and the eighth of his Raigne. She was, by the direction of her mother, brought vp in her Child-hood by the Countesse of Salisbury her neere kinswoman, for that as some thought, the Queene wished a marriage betwixt some of her sonnes and the Princesse, to strengthen her Title by that alliance into Yorke, if the King should die without issue Male. In her young yeares she was sued to be married with the Emperor, the King of Scots, and the Duke of Orleance in France, but all these fayling, and shee succeeding her Brother King Edward in the Crowne, at the age of thirty sixe yeares, matched with Philip King of Spaine, to the great dislike of many, and small content to her selfe, he being imployed for the most part beyond the Seas, for griefe whereof, and the losse of Callis, she lastly fell into a burning-feauer, that cost her her life.

(145) Elizabeth, the second Daughter of King Henrie, and first Childe by Queene Anne his second Wife, was borne at Greenwich, vpon Sunday the seauenth of September, the yeare of Christ Iesus 1533. and twenty fiue of her Fathers Raigne, who with due solemnities was baptized the Wednesday following, Archbishop Cranmar, the old Dutches of Norfolke, and the old Marchioness of Dorset being the witnesses at the Font, and the Marchioness of Exceter at the confirmation: She succeeded her sister Queene Mary in the Monarchy of England, and was for wisdome, vertue, piety, and justice, not onely the Mirrour of her Sexe, but a patterne for Gouernement to all the Princes in Christendome: whose name I may not mention without all dutifull remembrance, and whose memory vnto me is most deare, amongst the many thousands that receiued extraordinary fauours at her gracious and most liberall hand. An. D. 1533.

(146) Another man-childe Queene Anne bare vnto King Henry, though without life, vpon the nine and twentieth of Ianuary, and twenty seauen of his raigne, to the no little griefe of the mother, and some dislike of the King, as the sequell of her accusation and death did shortly confirme. Iohn Stow.

(147) Edward, the last childe of King Henry, and first of Queene Iane, his third wife, was borne at Hampton-Court, the twelfth of October, the yeare of Grace 1537. and twenty nine of the Kings Raigne, being cut out of his mothers wombe as is constantly affirmed, like as Iulius Cæsar is said to haue beene: his Godfathers at the Font, was Thomas Cranmar Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolke, his sister Lady Mary being Godmother, saith Grafton: Sixe dayes after his birth he was created Prince of Wales, and at the death of his Father, succeeded him in all his dominions, of whom more followeth hereafter.

His Naturall Issue.

(148) Henry Fitz-Roy, the naturall sonne of King Henry the eight, was begotten of the Lady Talbois, called Elizabeth Blunt, and borne in the Mannor of Blackamoore in Essex, about the tenth yeare of his Raigne; at the age of sixe yeares he was created Earle of Nottingham, and in the fiue and twentieth of his Fathers raigne, vpon the eighteenth of Iune, in the Kings Pallace of Bridewell, was made Duke of Richmond and Sommerset, Lord Warden of the East, West, & Middle-Marches against Scotland, and Lieutenant-Generall of all the parts of England Northward, he was a Prince very forward in Martiall Actiuities, of good literature and knowledge in the tongues, vnto whom the learned Antiquary Leland dedicated a Booke; He married Mary daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall and Lord high Treasurer of England, with whom he liued not long, but dyed at Saint Iames by Westminster, the two and twentieth of Iuly, in the yeare of Christ Iesus 1536. and was buried at Framingham in Suffolke. An. D. 1519. Ioh. Stow. Annals. Thomas Millet. Holinshead saith at Thetford in Norfolke. p. 1237.

Holinsh. p. 883.

THe tempestuous stormes in the Raigne of this King Henry the eight, and the violent deluge raysed against the Church-state of his times; bare downe so many religious strong foundations, and were the destruction of so many beautifull Monasteries, as the onely relation of their numbers and names, would haue much interrupted the narration of his History. Wherefore to retaine their memorials, (though their walls are laid waste) aswell for the reuerence we owe vnto venerable Antiquity, as for the example of their Founders holy zeale, we haue inserted a Catalogue of their names, orders, and true valuations, as in the originall Booke thereof taken by Commission, and giuen vnto the King, we finde them set downe, though at their dissolutions their values were fauourably and farre vnder-rated. Some Founders, and times of foundations we want; the rest, Table-wise, (to auoid prolixity) we haue set downe in this present following CHAPTER.

A CATA-

A CATALOGVE OF THE RELIGIOVS HOVSES VVITHIN THE REALME OF ENGLAND and VVales, with their Orders, Founders, Benefactors, and Values, moſt of them being ſuppreſſed by King Henry the eight. Together with ſuch other ſacred places, as either then were by him left ſtanding, or ſince haue been erected.

THE

THE DIVINITY SCHOOLE AND LIBERARIE.

THE DIVINITY Schoole and LIBERARY, a moſt Magnificent and Stately building, was founded in the raigne of King Edward the fourth, as appeareth by his Armes and Supporters, viz. a Greyhound and a Bull, grauen in ſtone on the top of the vaults, in euery partition in the nether Roome, now ſeruing for the Diuinity Schoole. The worke was done at the coſt and charges of diuers perſons Spirituall and Temporall: And as it ſhould ſeeme by the Armes of moſt of them, both cut in Stone in the roofe of the Vault, as alſo in the Windowes, there was an intention and generall contribution for this worke, long before it was begun, for that many of thoſe Benefactors whoſe Armes are there ſet vp, were dead long before the Fabrick was taken in hand. It was well furniſhed with Bookes, Richard Angeruil dyed long before this Library was built, and therefore is not to be named as a Benefactor. Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter, who gaue 129 choyce Bookes, all of them Manuſcripts, which he procured out of Italy. It continued in good eſtate vntill the wauering and vncertaine time of King Edward the ſixt, when ſome ill-diſpoſed, out of their priuate auarice enuying the Common good, deſtroyed the Liberary, conuerting thoſe Bookes to their owne priuate vſe. But lately, in the raigne of our Soueraigne King Iames, this wrong and ſacriledge hath been ſupplied by that worthy Mæcenas and Ptolomey of our times, Sir Thomas Bodley Knight, who hath beſtowed many thouſand pounds, not onely in getting the choyſeſt Authors and Bookes in all Chriſtendome, and from the remoteſt parts in the World; but alſo in making An. 1611. a new Croſſe-building anſwerable to the magnificy of the former worke, finiſhed Anno 1613. and a faire new Gallery ouer the building of the Schooles. So that now it is one of the chiefeſt Libraries in the World, for vſe, ſtore of Bookes, and magnificence.

Taken from the possession of the Clergy by Henry the eight, and conuerted to temporall vses out of the former summe, 161100. l. 9. s. 7. d. q. Since in this precedent Table, wee haue laid to the Readers view a great part of this Kings ill, the waste of so much of Gods reuenew (howsoeuer abused) let him not holde it in curiosity, out of season, since it may in Charity fall well in sequence by setting downe the Churches either erected, or restored by him, or by him (which is the now state of our Clergy) continued, to redeeme his memory, blemished by the former error from the vulgar aspersion of sacrilegious impiety.

This King after the dissolution of the Religious houses, erected these sixe Bishopricks, to witte, Westminster, Chester, Peterborough, Oxford, Bristoll, and Glouceſter, whereof the fiue last are in esse, and at the same time he erected also these Cathedrall Churches hereafter mentioned, wher ein hee founded a Deane, and the number of Prebends following, viz.

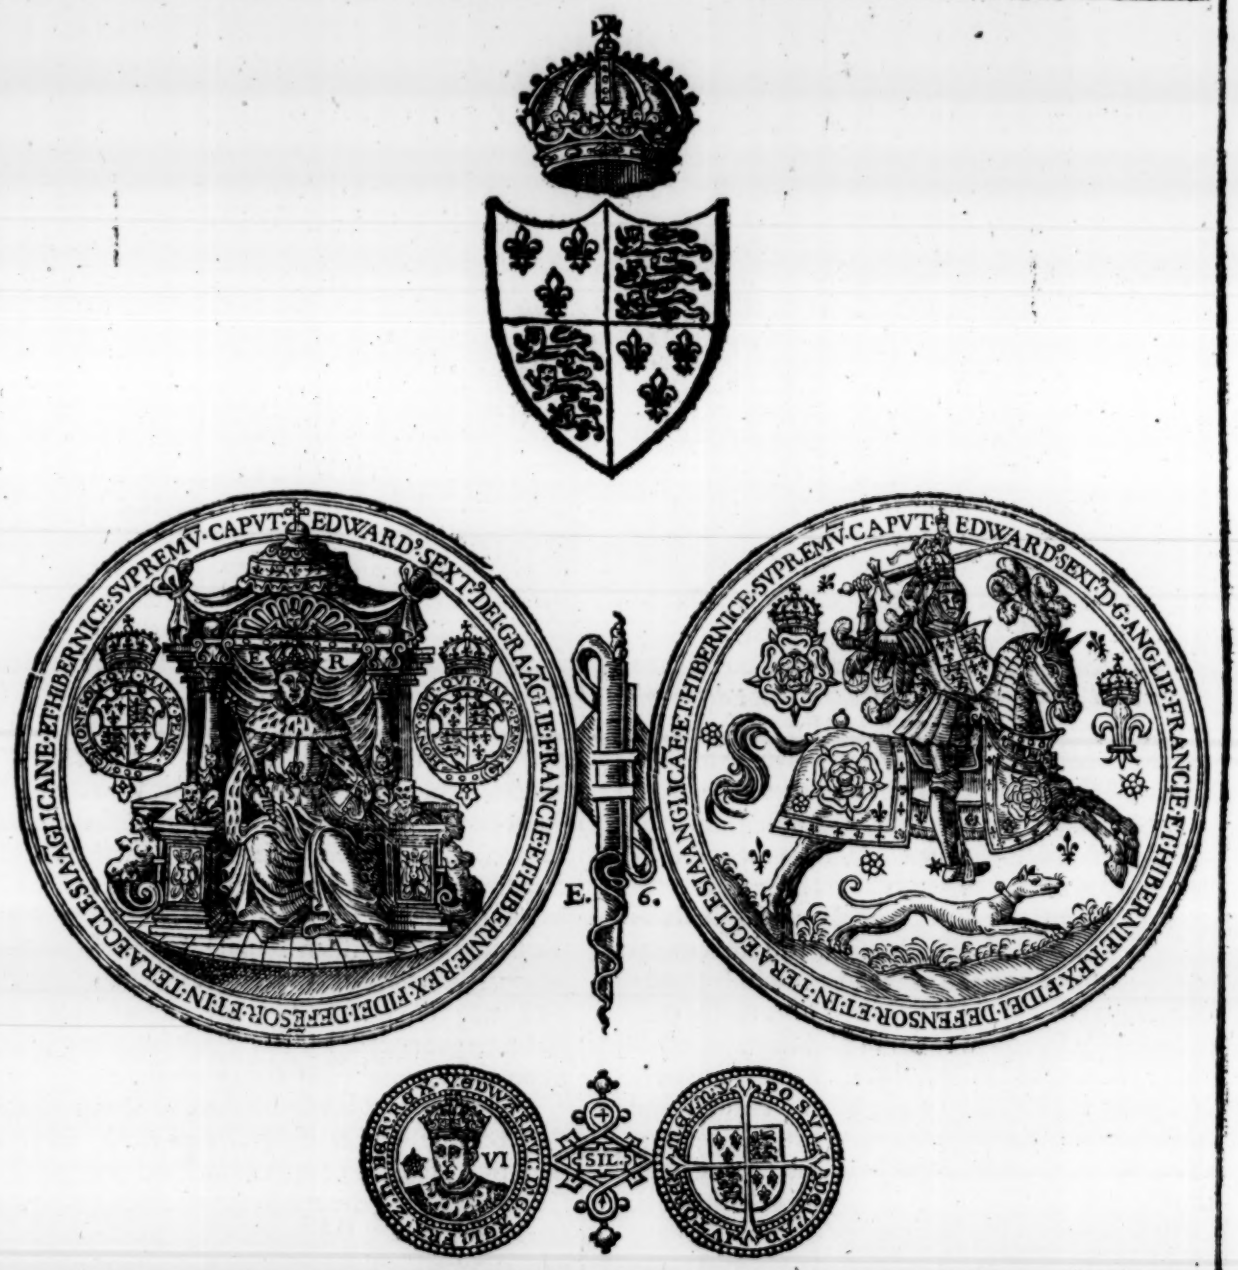
EDVVARD

Edward VI.

EDVVARD THE SIXT OF THAT NAME, KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. THE FIFTIE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS LIFE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

Monarch 59



CHAPTER XXII.

A.D. 1547.

EDWARD the sixt of that Name, and onely sonne liuing vnto King Henry the eight, was borne at his Mannor of Hampton-Court in Middlesex, the twelfth of October, and yeere of saluation, 1537. and sixe dayes after being the eighteenth of the same moneth, he was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester: his birth was ioyfull vnto the King and Commons; but the death of his Mother, the vertuous Queene Iane, brought immediate sorrow vnto both, whose wombe was cut (as some haue affirmed) to the sauing of his, but losse of her owne life, vpon whose death these elegant verses were writ;

R. Graston.

Edward created Prince of Wales, presently after his birth.

Phœnix Iana iacet nato Phœnice, dolendum
Sæcula Phœnices nulla tulisse duas.

Here lies the Phenix, Lady Iane, whose death a Phenix bare,
O griefe, two Phenixs at one time, together neuer were.

Alluding to the Creſt of her Father a Phœnix, in flames within a Crowne.

(2) Nine yeeres and odde moneths hee was vertuously trained vp in the life of his Father, and at his death appointed the first of his heires, and for want of Issue (if it so chanced) Mary, and shee failing, Elizabeth to succeed in his Throne: for as Henry with Salomon was blame-worthy for women, so left he but one sonne and two daughters, as the other in Scripture is said to haue done: Salomon had Rehoboam a foole, and vnfortunate, his daughters, but obscure, and both of them Subiects; but Henry

By his will dated the 30. of [illegible] ber. An. D. 15[illegible] was more happy in Edward his ſonne, who proued another young Salomon himſelfe, and his ſiſters both Soueraignes of an Imperiall Crowne.

An.D.1546. (3) He beganne his raigne the twenty eight of Ianuary, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1546. and the laſt of that moneth was proclaimed King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith; and ſupreme Gouernour of theſe Churches, with other his rightful Titles to his Imperiall Stiles belonging. And on the twentieth of February following, being Shroue-Sunday, was Crowned at Weſtminſter with all due Solemnities.

Iohn Stow.

The Duke of Hereford made Protector by Parliament.

(4) His Counſellours were appointed by his ſicke Father as we haue ſaid, and Protector ouer his Minority and Realmes (by conſent of the Nobles) was ordained his Vncle Edward Lord Seymer, Earle of Hereford and Duke of Sommerſet, brother vnto Queene Iane, who thereupon gaue the young King the Order of Knight-hood, and the King immediately did the like vnto the Lord Mayor of London.

2 Chron. 34. (5) His firſt buſineſſe was to eſtabliſh Gods ſeruice, who had eſtabliſhed him in the Throne, and as another Ioſiah in godly zeale, deſtroyed Idolatry, by pulling downe Images in England, as that King in Iudah did the Altars of Baalim; ſought the Saluation of his Subiects, by ſending forth Preachers to inſtruct the people, as Ioſiah did the Leuites, the teachers of Iſrael vnto their charges: brought the Bible in a knowne language to be read in the Church, as hee did the Arke into the Temple of the Lord; commanded the ancient and true vſe of the Sacrament in both kinds, as Ioſiah commanded the Paſſeouer both to be kild and celebrated in Ieruſalem, and in all things proued another Ioſiah indeed.

Ioſiah and King Edward compared.
2 Chron. 35.

Statutes Ed.6. An.1. (6) And as Edward was buſied in ſetting forth Gods glory, ſo the Protector and Councell were carefull for the State of the Realme, and eſpecially for their Kings marriage with Mary the yong Queen of Scotland, vnto which a Parliament at Edenburgh had conſented in Anno 1543. and for confirmation thereof, had ſent into England, William Earle of Glancarn, Sir George Dowglas, Sir William Hamilton, and Sir Iames Leirmound, Scotiſh Knights, Ambaſſadors, vnto King Henry deceaſed, betwixt whom the contracts were ſealed interchangeably as we haue ſaid.

Iohn Leſlie. B. R.

Hall. Grafton.

(7) And now by the Counſell of England was thought moſt fit to be ſought after, and conſummated, for the wealth and peace of the whole Iland: wherefore they publiſhed their deſires to that end, in an Epiſtle ſent to the Scotiſh Nobility, directed vnto them by the Lord Protector; wherein they were remembred of the many incurſions, roades, and ſpoiles, committed and done, vpon either Kingdome through their continual hoſtilities, and warres: ſhewing likewiſe the neereneſſe of language, lineaments, and conditions of the Nations; inhabiting the ſame Iland, and therefore a moſt ſure token (as they tooke it) to be deſcended from one and the ſame Originall; vrging Gods prouidence, that had taken away all the Male-Princes of Scotland, leauing them only one daughter; and in England, onely one ſonne vnto King Henry among his many wiues. Their Princes themſelues for yeeres, qualities, and magnificence, fitly ordained to contract the vnion of Peace: alleaging that England ſought neither the preheminence, nor the conqueſt of Scotland, but rather deſired an equality both in State and gouernment; and to that end offered to take the name of Britaines, indifferent to both, though diſhonorable to themſelues, in bereauing their Nation of the glory atchieued, in many of their victories. Theſe notwithſtanding, the Scotiſh perſiſted, to beſtow their young Queene another way.

The Engliſh made Proclamation in Scotland.

(9) The Gouernour of Scotland hearing newes of many Caſtles ſurrender and ſurpriſe, and feares daily encreaſing by augmented reports, commanded his Heraulds with all poſſible diligence, to paſſe through all the parts of the Realme, and the Fire-Croſſe to be borne whereſoeuer they came; a Cuſtome indeed anciently vſed in greateſt extremity, and onely then after this manner, two fire-Brands ſet a Croſſe, were carried vpon the point of a ſpeare, with Proclamation of the eminent danger, calling for aide, aſſigning the time and place, when and whither they were to reſort: yet there be that ſay, It was a painted red Croſſe ſet vp for certaine dayes in the Field of that Barony, whereunto the aide ſhould come: and thoſe that refuſed, being aboue ſixteene, and vnder ſixty were accounted traitours, and their Land confiſcated to the King. This ancient muſter the Gouernour commanded, appointing them a day to be at * Muſſelbrut, in defence of their liberties and young Princes life: which preſently ſtrucke ſuch regard to their hearts, that thither they ſtroue who ſhould be firſt, and pitched their Standards euen in the face of the Enemy.

(10) Many warlike enterpriſes were attempted betwixt them, many priſoners taken, and ſtout Souldiers ſlaine, vpon the Scots part the Lord Hume by a fall from his horſe loſt his life, and his ſonne with one Maxwell and ſixe other Gentlemen taken priſoners. Of the Engliſh were hurt Henry Vane, and Barteuill, a French-man: Bulmer, Gower, and Crouch, three Captaines of the light horſemen were taken priſoners: all which ſo happened before the day of great Battell.

The Scotiſh Armie thereupon remoued ſomewhat South-ward, ſeeking to get the higher ground, with aduantage both of Sunne and winde, the deſire whereof cauſed them little to regard the helpe of Horſe, but for haſte drew their great Ordinance thitherward onely by maine ſtrength of men.

(14) The Engliſh Captaines perceiuing what the Scotiſh intended, and that now no skirmiſh but a Battell muſt be vndergone, fell to Conſultation, as they ſate mounted in their ſaddles, where with ſuch reſolutions they departed aſunder, that Iohn Earle of Warwicke, Lord Marſhall of the field, deſired the Protector to be good vnto his wife and Children, if on his part things went not well with him. By this time the Armies were at point to ioyne battell, in the place called Edmondſtone-edge, neere vnto Muſkelborough, where the Maſter of the Engliſh Ordinance had mounted two Canons neere vnto the top of the hill. The Scotiſh came forward, faſter then an ordinary Marche, their Pikemen thicke ranged together, bearing broad Bucklers in their left hands.

(16) The Canons from the hill, played ſore vpon the Scotiſh, and ſo did the Ordinance out of the Engliſh Fleete, whoſe terrible noiſe and ſmoake, filled the Armies with furious Cries, and darkened the day as with the Clouds of night: The retreat of the Protectors Horſemen, diſordering their fellowes (as is ſaid) gaue ſignes vnto the Scots of a preſent victory, who now vpon a forward Courage diſranked themſelues for haſt, and fell vpon the disbanded Engliſh, who preſently by their leaders were brought into Array, and fiercely preſſed forward vpon the vantgard of the enemy, their aduantage the more, for that the Scots wanted ſhot to anſwere their violence: which cauſed them in haſte confuſedly to retire towards their great Battell; and thoſe miſdeeming the day had beene loſt, turned their backes and fled; the chaſe was followed almoſt fiue miles, wherein the Lord Fleming with ſundry men of note were ſlaine: Biſhop Leſlie recordeth nine by name, beſides ten thouſand of their ſouldiers that therein loſt their liues, and priſoners taken, about a thouſand perſons, the chiefe whereof was the Earle of Huntly, Chancellour of Scotland, the Lord Yeſter, Hobby, Hamilton, Captaine of Dunbarre, the Maſter of Sanpoole, the Lord wimmes, and a brother of the Earle of Caſſils: ſuch was the ſucceſſe of the Engliſh, and loſſe of the Scottiſh.

(23) To theſe their Demands the King ſent an anſwere, therein pittying their ignorance, and blaming their folly, and therewithall his Generall pardon, to as many as would deſiſt whiles it was time. Firſt he reproued them, for their preſumptions, thus contumeliouſly to riſe againſt their dread Soueraigne, to the diſturbance of his loyall Subiects peace; whoſe ſimplicity they had notoriouſly abuſed, in vſing his name to draw them into action of Rebellion: and no leſſe likewiſe in the grounds of their demands. As in their firſt Article for Baptiſme, where it was well known the ſame was admitted as neceſſity required, or rather commanded by the Booke of Common Prayer, publiſhed by authority of Parliament, and as themſelues knew in preſent practiſe. But touching the Sacrament in their ſecond Article, how impudently they did belie the true receiuers thereof, was manifeſt, who make ſo much difference in that holy adminiſtration, that they account no profit in Common bread, beſides the nouriſhment of their naturall Bodies: but this bleſſed bread to be the food of their ſoules vnto eternall life. And as you are ſeduced in theſe (ſaith the admonition) ſo in confirmation alſo they carry your ſimplicities captiue, for the truth teacheth no otherwiſe then themſelues beleeue, namely, that a Child baptized, and dying before confirmation, is nethleſſe in ſtate of Grace, elſe are themſelues cauſers of their childrens damnation: ſo the ſeruice of God brought from an vnknowne tongue, cannot ſurely offend any reaſonable man, which is onely to make him vnderſtand that, which before he knew not, and to giue his conſent to thoſe prayers, wherof he hath moſt need, and giueth the neereſt touch to his owne feeling conſcience, for God requireth the heart onely which with an vnderſtanding ſeruice, wee muſt ſacrifice vnto him. But moſt of all (ſaith this good King) we maruell at your demand, for the ſixe Articles reſtored, to haue them in power as formerly hath beene. Doe you know what you aske, or in obtaining doe you know what you get? They were lawes indeed lately made, but quickly repented; too cruell for you, and too mercileſſe for vs; who would haue our Raigne written with milke, and not with bloud, and becauſe they were bloudy, wee tooke them away, with the ſame authority, by which they were made; leſt retaining them, our Sword ſhould be too often drawne, and rigour extended vpon our true and well-deſeruing ſubiects. We for our parts ſeeke no longer to liue, then to be a father vnto our people, and as God hath made vs your rightfull King, ſo hath he commanded you vnto obedience: by whoſe great Maieſty we ſweare, you ſhall feele the power of the ſame God in our ſword; which how mighty it is, no ſubiect knoweth: how puiſſant it is, no priuate man can iudge, and how mortall, no Engliſh heart can thinke: therefore embrace our mercy while it is offered, leſt the bloud ſpilt by your meanes cry vengeance from the Earth, and be heard in the eares of the Lord in Heauen.

The Lord Ruſſell, though weake in compariſon of them, holding it more honour to aſſaile, then to be aſſaulted, made forward euen vnto the Bridge: at whoſe ſight the Enemies prepared themſelues to fight, and with a ſtrong guard maintained the Bridge, beſides which there was no paſſage ouer the Riuer, that held his courſe betwixt the two Armies.

(25) Great were the attempts the Lord Lieutenant gaue, and manfull was the reſiſtance that the Rebell made, yet laſtly the way was wonne, and followed vnto the battell of the diſloyals: where preſently beganne a moſt cruell fight, and a while was maintained to the loſſe of their bloud, but the falſe hearts failing, and the true ſubiects courage increaſing, the Corniſh immediately gaue backe and fled, whereat the Kings ſouldiers out of Order fell to the ſpoile, minding nothing leſſe then that which preſently enſued, for the Corniſhmen perceiuing their diſordered carriage, ſuddenly returned, and began a new fight, when the Lord Ruſſell likewiſe ordered a new his Army: theſe furiouſly ioyning, a ſharpe and cruell encounter enſued, with the loſſe of much bloud, and the liues of three hundred Rebels, who laſtly tooke to their heeles, and left the field: the chaſe a while followed, and the Souldiers ſcattered, a fearefull crie ſuddenly aroſe, that all the Commons were vp, which cauſed the Lord Generall to returne vnto Honiton: whether ſhortly came the Lord Grey of Wilton, hauing in pay Spiniola an Italian Captaine with three hundred ſhot.

(27) The newes whereof bruted, and the Papall ſide bruiſed by theſe three ouerthrowes, the Commons in whole troupes reſorted to their aide, and to make all ſure on their ſide (by the preſence and helpe of their conſecrated God) they brought into the field the Crucifixe vnder a Canopy, which in ſtead of an Altar was ſet in a carte, accompanied with Croſſes, and Candleſtickes, Banners, Holy-Bread, and holy-water, both to driue away Diuels, and to dull their enemies ſwords; which notwithſtanding they did not, neither could they deliuer themſelues in the day of deſtruction; for the Towne being fired, and the Armies met vpon Clift heath, a moſt cruell and bloudy battell was fought, wherein was ſlaine the whole rout of the Rebels, and all theſe trinkets caſt in the durt.

The Crucifixe brought in a cart into the field.

(28) The chiefe Captaines were taken and ſent vnto London, who were Humfrey Arundell, winſland, Holwes, and Burie, who there paid the Law with the loſſe of their liues. (29) At the ſame time, and neere the ſame place dwelled a Miller, who had beene a buſie doer in the Rebellion, but hee knowing the danger, willed his man to take the name of the maſter, if any enquired after him; whereupon the ſaid Sir Anthony came to the mill, and calling for the maſter, the man in his name preſented himſelfe, who ſtrait commanded him vnto the Gallowes, the ſeruant then ſeeing the danger of death, confeſſed hee was not the maſter, but the man: well, ſaid the Knight, thou canſt neuer doe thy maſter better ſeruice then to hang for him, and thereupon truſſed him vppe in the next tree.

(30) As theſe things were in acting in the Weſt, ſo other commotions aroſe in other partes of the Land, though broched vnder another pretence, namely the laying open of incloſures, which the king by Proclamation had commanded to bee done, but many offenders bearing themſelues out with greatneſſe, ſlackened the execution, and the poorer preſuming vpon the Kings pleaſure, beganne to execute his commiſſion themſelues, and thoſe in many places at once, as in Kent, Eſſex, Sommerſet, Buckingham, Northampton and Lincolne-ſhieres they did.

Commotions for Incloſures.

A.D. 1549. Commotions in Norfolke.

(31) But moſt dangerous was that in Norfolke, whoſe Inhabitants following the examples of the reſt, held out much longer, and in more violent mauer. Their firſt attempt was at Atilborough againſt one Greene that had taken away part of their commons, next at Wimonham, where by the inſtigation of Iohn Flowerdew they caſt downe the fences of Incloſures, belonging to Robert Ket a Tanner in the ſame Towne; who to bee euen with Flowerdew brought them to Hetherſet, and ſet them on worke to pull downe both hedge and ditch of his paſture grounds incloſed: to which worke hee gaue ſuch deſperate incouragements, that theſe vnrulies preſently choſe him for their ringleader, who with them paſſed to Bowthrope, laying all leuel where they came.

(32) Their number encreaſing, and doings outragious, Sir Edmund Windam Knight, at that time high Shiriffe of the Shire, made proclamatiō among them in the Kings name to depart, which if they did not forthwith, hee pronounced them Traitors, but had not his Horſe beene ſwifter, hee had beene either taken or ſlaine, thereupon their terror began to be fearefull, & themſelues to be furniſhed with weapons, Armour and Artillery, daily brought them in abundance by the By-dwellers, beſides ſtore of victuals to maintaine their campe.

Sir Edmund Windam in danger.

(33) But now conſidering what dangers were open, if diſperſedly ſcattered they ſhould attend their bad worke, they held it beſt policy to draw to one place: and to fortifie themſelues together with further ſtrength; whereupon with full reſolution, Monſhold was thonght fitteſt neere vnto Mount Surrey, a place built by theſe Earles of that County, and vpon S. Leonards hill which hangeth ouer Norwich, they vnkenelled themſelues; beſides theſe of Monſhold, a leſſer rabble of them lay at Riſing-chaſe neere Linne, which were rowſed thence by the Gentlemen of thoſe parts: who firſt from Watton, then from Thetford, and next from Brandon, were forced to their litter at Monſhold.

Monſhold the place of the randeuow.

(34) Their parts were rigorous, or rather inhumane euen to their welwillers, for it is a knowne truth, that Sir Roger Woodhouſe in kinde courteſie bringing them two Carts laden with Beere, and another with victuals, was recompenced with the loſſe of all his Horſes, his owne apparell, and his body tugged, and torne, caſt into a ditch, whom laſtly with others was impriſoned by them in the houſe of Mount Surrey, and yet would they ſeeme very Religious, hauing one Coniers for their Chaplen, who deuoutly ſaid ſeruice vnto them both morning and euening.

The inhumanities of the Commotioners.

(35) To thoſe, the lewdly diſpoſed of Suffolke aſſembled, as alſo the ſcumme and dregs out of Norwich, adding ſtill fewell to their owne ſmoaky flames by fireing of Beacons, ringing of Bels, and what not, to ſet all in an vproare: ſome true and faithfull ſubiects they violently led away, and made them of their councell, namely Thomas Cod Maior of Norwich, Robert Watſon Preacher, and Thomas Alderiche Gentlemā, Sergeant Catlyn, & Sergeant Gaudy, whom they kept fettered, and compelled them to be attendant vpon Kette; who now tooke vpon him to bee the Kings Deputy, and to giue out warrants in his Maieſties name, by vertue of which, many of Worſhip and credit were fetched from their dwellings, brought before him, and violently caſt into priſon: their Rabble encreaſed to the number of ſixteene thouſand men.

Supplies of the Commotioners.

Many good ſubiects forced to attend vpon the Rebels.

(36) And that the ſhew of Iuſtice and piety was only the marke whereat theſe lawleſſe leuelled, they ordained a Tribunall ſeat in an old tree, whoſe Canopie was the Cope of Heauen: in this ſate the Tanner as a Chauncellor or chiefe Iudge, accompanied with his Councellors, aſſiſted by two choſen men out of euery hundred among them, hither aſſembled the complaints of the Campe, and hence had they commiſſion to fetch out of Ships both Ordinance, powder and ſhotte, and out of Gentlemens houſes all abilements of warre: and heere ſuch Raskals as had exceeded their commiſsion, had iudgement of impriſonment, ſo that this tree was termed, the Oake of Reformation, whence likewiſe ſometimes Sermons were deliuered to the people, and once by the Reuerent Doctor Parker, which had almoſt coſt him his life.

The tree of Reformation.

(37) To theſe the Kings generall Pardon was publikely pronounced by an Herald at Armes, but ſo farre off from embracing, as the Rebels from the height of the hill, ſhot at the City, which doing little harme, they remoued their Ordinance to the lower ground, and thence beganne to batter the walles, and without great reſiſtance entred the town, where they became Maſters of all the munitions, and empriſoned the Maior, and many other Citizens.

The Kings pardon contemned.

The great Ordinance wonne by the Rebels.

sought to quiet, and to that end sent the L. William Parr, Marques of Northampton, with fifteen hundred horsemen vnto Norwich, accompanied with the Lords Sheffeild, and Wentworth, besides manie Knights; who at his first comming thither, summoned the City to yeeld; the Magistrates whereof as willingly obeyed, and repairing to his Standard, yeelded vp their Cities sword vnto him; declaring themselues true subiects to the King, though some of the baser sort had fauoured Kets doing, and with them immediately the Lord Marquesse entred the City, which the same night was assaulted by the Rebels, whom hee manfully resisted, and slew three hundred of their riotous rout.

(39) The next day following these bloud-hounds vnkennelled by troupes, and entring the City by the Hospitall, beganne a most cruell fight, wherein the Lord Sheffield by the fal of his horse into a ditch was butcherly slaine by a Butcher, as hee sought to recouer himselfe, and the rebels now fleshed with this their fortunate chance, followed the chase with such slaughter and cry, that they forced the Lord Marquesse to forsake the Citie, and therein tooke Sir Thomas Cornwallis prisoner, whom they straitly kept in durance till their last ouerthrow. Norwich they ransackt and set on fire, whose ashes as yet fill vppe their ruines, and more had been made, had not God quenched these flames by showers from Heauen.

(40) The Lord Marquesse returned, and the Rebels holding Norwich, it was more then time to looke to the maine chance; and therefore those forces that were gathered to inuade others, were now thought the fittest to secure our selues, ouer whom was appointed the Lord Iohn Dudley, the warlike Earle of Warwicke: hee comming to Cambridge prepared for the enemy, whither resorted the foresaide Lord Marquesse, the Lords Willoughby, Powes, and Gray, his sonnes Ambrose and Robert, with manie of the Norfolke men, and the twenty three of August shewed himselfe vpon the plaine before Norwich, whence to saue the effusion of bloud, hee sent Norrey and a Trumpet to summon the City, and to offer a generall pardon; which being againe refused, hee caused his Ordinance to bee planted against S. Steuens gate, and his Pioners to breake open the brasen gate, whereat manie made entry, and diuers were slaine.

(41) S. Steuens gate forced open by Canon shot, the Earle of Warwicke entred the City, and with small resistance came into the Market place, where threescore Rebels were incontinently executed by Marshall law. But the Earles carriages passing thorough the City, were surprised and taken by the enemy, wherein was great store of powder and shot, which with triumph they conuaied to their Campe, and tooke it a signe of further successe, their want consisting most in those prouisions, whereupon they manned the streets of that City, and slew very many of the Kings friends, but the showers of arrowes and shot from the Kings Subiects so rained amongst them, that they were forced backe to take shelter in Monshold their hole of refuge.

(42) The Earle of Warwicke thus mastring the City, shut all the Gates, them onely excepted that gaue way toward Monshold, and those hee planted with his great Artillery. The Rebels perceiuing what hee went about, suddainely made downe towards the Gate, and with great courage and confused cries, fell with such violence vpon their attendants, that they gaue backe and fled, leauing their Ordinance to the will of the Rebels, who presently disposed them amongst their owne, so that the Earle stopped likewise these passages, and imploied all his endeuour to defend the City, which notwithstanding he could not, the Rebels making incursions ouer the riuer from their well stored Campe: and setting the streetes in many places on fire, whose attempts so continued and prospered to euill, as some despairing of any good, councelled the Earle to bee gone. But so farre was hee from such staine of honour, that drawing forth his owne sword, commanded other to doe the like, and with an interchangeable kisse confirmed the resolution of his bold courage, a custome indeed vsed in greatest danger of warre. And thereupon determining another way to worke, sought to stop the passage from all conuoy of victuall; which the Rebels perceiuing, set fire on their Cabbins, and with ensignes displayed, entrenched themselues at the foote of the Hill, in the valley called Dussin-dale, partly vpon vaine Prophecies pronounced among them by certaine wizards, who gaue forth that Hob, Dic, and Hic, (meaning the Rustickes) with their Clubs should fill vp the valley of Dussin dale with the bodies of the dead.

The noble resolution of the Earle of Warwick

The vaine prophesie of the Rebels.

(43) The next day being the seauen and twentieth of August, the Lord Generall prepared for fight, hauing newly receiued a supply of fourteene hundred Lances. But before that Mars should trie his strength by sword, he sent vnto them a Generall pardon for all things that were past, which when they had againe vtterly reiected, he ranged his battels for fight. The Rebels likewise, set themselues in order, where in the fore-ranke all the Gentlemen whom they had taken Prisoners, were placed and coupled in Irons for starting away, so that their dangers were doubled, and themselues exposed to death aswell by their friends, as by their enemies.

The L. Generall offred the rebels a generall pardon.

(44) But before the charge could be giuen, one Miles a most skilfull Gunner amongst them made shot at the Kings Standard, and strucke the Bearer thereof in the thigh, and his horse through the shoulder, which so moued the Earle that he caused a whole volley of Artillery to bee discharged against them, when Captaine Drury with his owne band and the Almanes, thrust sore vpon them, and opened their Battell, whereby most of the Captiue-Gentlemen escaped away, vpon which brunt the Earles light horsemen came so valiantly on, that the Rebels gaue backe and fled: and with the formost Robert Ket their Captaine, vppon a swift horse galloped away, the Chase continued three miles and more, with the slaughter of three thousand and fiue hundred Rebels.

The Kings Standard struck.

The Rebels discomfited and many slaine.

(45) Their battell thus broken, and the most part fled: those notwithstanding that kept about the Ordinance, determined to die like men, and inclosing themselues among the Carts and Carriages, had the aduantage of a Trench and certaine stakes stucke against the horsemen, whereby they stoode more resolutely at defence. The Noble Earle pitying their case, and loath to loose so many braue men, sent Norrey King at Armes vnto them, with proffer of pardon if they would lay downe Armes, and returne to obedience, otherwise they well saw, there was no way but death: Their answere was, that they were free borne English men, who disdained all ignominious death, wherunto they said, they were appointed, and barrels of ropes brought into the field (as thy were informed) to strangle them, so that if they must needes die, they chose the manly deathes of Souldiers, not trusting the sugred promises for surprize, and then to be trussed vp like dogs.

The compassion of the L. Generall.

(46) Their answere returned, and compassion still working in the Lord Generals breast, euen when hee had set his whole Army against them both of horse and foote; and the signe of battell ready to haue been giuen, hee sent to them once more, to know if they would belieue and imbrace their pardon, if hee came in person to declare it to them himselfe; whereunto they answered, that they knew him to be honourable, and would from his mouth most thankefully receiue it: thereupon hee repayred vnto them, and causing againe their pardon to be read, confirmed the same with such effectuall words, as they all cast away their weapons, and with one voice cried, God saue King Edward.

The Rebels yeeld and receiue the Kings pardon.

(47) The

Robert Ket apprehended.

(47) The day following, Ket the Captaine of this ſedition, crept into a Barne of one M. Riches of Swanington, was by two of his ſeruants apprehended, & with 20. horſemen conueied to Norwich, where 9. of the chiefeſt Rebels had iudgement of death, and were all of them hanged vpon the Oake of Reformation, which not till then, had the true note of that name. Ket with his brother William were broght vnto London, and thence backe againe into Norfolke, where William Ket the younger was hanged vpon the high Steeple of Windmondham, and Robert Ket the Arch-Rebell in chaines vpon the caſtle of Norwich, whoſe Citizens annually ſolemnized the day of their deliuery with no leſſe ioy, then the Iewes did when they had eſcaped the ſword of wicked Haman.

The oake of Reformation is made the tree of Reformation indeed.

Ket and his brother executed.

Eſter 9.17.

(48) Theſe hazards ſet in the South, Weſt, and Eaſt, the North likewiſe among them would come in for a caſt, as forward and able to vndergoe rebellion, and their zeale as hote as any others, the occaſion conceiued, was the Papall Religion aboliſhed by Law, whoſe tottering toppe they meant to make ſteady by maine ſtrength of Armes, notwithſtanding the very foundations were ſo ſhrewdly vndermined. The place where this canker beganne was Seimer in the North-riding in Yorkſhire ſpreading it ſelfe further into the Eaſt-riding alſo, & the firſt broachers of this giddy heady wine, were perſons no better then William Ombler a Yeoman, Thomas Dale a Pariſh Clerke, and one Steuenſon the Poſt, imployed to blanch forth theſe buſineſſes betwixt them.

A.D. 1549. The Northerns moue rebellion.

Religion euer made the cauſe of Commotion.

Wil. Ombler. Th. Dale.

(49) Their pretences were faire, as to reſtore the Church her right, and to diſburden the land of all grieuances impoſed theſe ſtrings euer ſounding, that the Pope was the Man, that King Edward was an Intruder, if not a meere heretike, that the Church had the power of both the ſwords, which now vpon a blinde propheſie they preſuppoſed ſhould bee drawne againſt the King & his Nobles, whoſe times (as they beleeued) ſhould bee no more, but that the land ſhould bee ruled by foure Gouernoues, when the Commons ſhould meete in a Parliament, aſſembled from the foure winds, which they interpreted from foure Coaſts of England, whereof themſelues now made the laſt.

Vpon a blind propheſie the Northren Commotioners rely.

(50) Firſt therefore to raiſe men, and to bring all into confuſion, they fired their Beacons, whence the ſparkes of ſedition were carried amaine; for the rudeſt alwaies vnwilling to labour, and the fitteſt fewell to breake into flame, flocked together on heapes, each one hauing a Common-wealth in his head, and all of them diſliking the reformation of religion that the King had commanded. Among theſe the moſt ſeditious had euer a voice which drew conſent to forward the Action, and eſpecially to beare downe the rich, whereof they made their firſt aſſay vpon White a Gentleman, Sauage a Marchant, Clopton and Berry; whom they cruelly murthered, and diſpoiling them of their apparrell, left their naked bodies on the Would before Seimer, thence paſſing forward from Towne to Towne, tooke many away that were vnwilling to goe, and all to fullfill their perfidious propheſie.

The idle and rude euer the fitteſt to broach miſchiefe.

Raph. Holinſh. Chr.

(51) Their number now increaſed vnto three thouſand, the Country beganne to grow in great feare, eſpecially the Gentlemen, and the richer ſort, ſeeing their liues and ſubſtance thus thirſted for and ſought after: but preſently downe came the kings pardon with profers of life, which ſo willingly was imbraced, that Ombler and Dale were quite forſaken, & almoſt left alone, who with Wright, Peacocke, Weatherell, and Battry were worthily executed at Yorke vpon the one and twenty of September following.

The Kings pardon diſſolueth the Commotion.

Ombler & others executed. Exactis iudicij, &c.

(52) As the Commons by theſe tumultuous rebellions greatly diſquieted the peace of the land ſo the chiefeſt Lords did diſturbe the Court of the yong King, where the greateſt Counſellors through emulation and diſdaine, banded each againſt others, without reſpect of themſelues, or regard of their Soueraigne; whereof the Kings vncles, the Protector and Admirall are noted for the firſt, and with the firſt paid their offences with their liues: but both were the brethren of Queene Iane the Kings mother deceaſed, the elder Lord Edward Duke of Somerſet was Protector of his Perſon, Realmes and Dominions. And Thomas Lord Seamer Baron of Sudley the younger, high Admirall of England, both worthy perſons, had they known their own worths: for ſo long ſtood they in ſafety of life and true honor as the bounds of brotherhood and nature ſtood vnviolated betwixt them: but that once broken, their liues lay open to diſhonour and death.

Emulation among the priuy Councellors.

The Protector and his brother the Admirall at ods.

(53) The younger brother Lord Thomas had married Queen Katharine Parre, the laſt of the many wiues of King Henry the eight, who vndoubtedly bore himſelfe no meaner by that match, neither ſhe the ſtate or name of a Dowager Queen: though of her ſelfe a woman compleate with ſingular humility. And the Dutcheſſe of Somerſet matched with the greateſt Peere in the Land, held her State equall to her husbands degree: and for place and precedency, as report hath diuulged the lamentable tragedy of theſe two great Brethren beganne; which now in acting brought vpon the Stage at ocne their owne deſtructions, the Lands rebellions, and the griefes of the good young King, into a fatall and vnrecouerable ſickneſſe, whereof laſtly followed his death.

Strife betwixt women cauſed the deaths of their husbands.

(54) So ſubtile is the old ſerpent, and ſo ready euer to ſow tares among wheate, that he diſturbed religions proceedings with al theſe calamities almoſt at one time; firſt, ſetting matters of diſcord betwixt them, by ſcandalizing tongues, then iealouſies of ſuſpitions ſpiced with enuy; and laſtly hatred vnto death. Inſomuch that the Protector ſuffered his brother to be accuſed and condemned in Parliament of high Treaſon (whether true or falſe, God onely knoweth) and vnder his owne hand writing, committed his head to the axe: whereby one of the three twiſted cords of Englands ſtrength was cùt aſunder by that fatall and vnhappy ſtroake, and his owne now made looſe in the Cable prooued too weake by farre to hold faſt the Anchor, wherby the ſhippewracke of his owne life was ſhortly made.

M. Fox in Acts & Mon.

Lord Thomas Seimer attainted and beheaded.

(55) The Lord Admirals inditement was, that hee had purpoſed to deſtroy the young King, and to tranſlate the Crowne vnto himſelfe, as ſtandeth recorded in Statute made the third of this Kings raigne, for which the twenty of March he ſuffered death vpon the Tower-hill; which as many ſuppoſed that it was the Dutches of Somerſets doings: ſo the wiſer ſort feared, it would be the ruine of her husband the Duke, the experiment wherof had often been approued, and indeed was too fatally linked as it chanced in theſe two brethren.

The L. Admirals inditement.

Ex Stat. Record.

(56) For the Admirall being made away by order of law, the giddy Commons without either order, or law, roſe vp in their Inſurrections as hath been ſaid: And the Lords returned from their ſuppreſſions, beganne forthwith to enuy and article againſt the Protector, which they publiſhed by Proclamation againſt him, wherein hee was accuſed, 1. of euill gouerment: 2. the loſſe of the Kings Peeres in France: 3. to be ambitious in his buildings: 4. regardleſſe of the Counſellors: 5. a ſower of ſedition amongſt the Nobles: 6. dangerous to the King: 7. a ſcandalizer of the Councell: 8. and laſtly, that he was no leſſe then a Traitor. Againſt whom they deſired the aid of the Londoners to take from him the King; to all which ſeuenteene Counſellers ſubſcribe their names.

Articles againſt the L. Protector.

(57) Theſe Statiſts in conſultation daily at London, and the Protector reſiding ſtill with the King, intercourſe of letters were interchãgeably both ſent and receiued, whereof two, from either part one, and euen at one inſtant were ſent vnto the Lord Maior and and Citizens of London, requiring their aide in these their opposite quarrels, and surely in their assembly the tale of the Lords by the Recorder was so well tolde, as had not a graue * Citizen stept vp betimes, the common Councell had granted aid against their King, whose wisdome and loyalty, in regard my selfe a Citizen, would haue it recorded to his enerlasting memory, and an example and motiue for our obedient loue and duety toward our Soueraignes, I will insert as I finde them vttered and spoken.

* George Stradlon.

George Stradlon his Oration.

"(58) In this case (said hee) good it is to thinke "on things past, to auoide the danger of things to "come; for I remember a story written by Fabian "in his Chronicles of the warres betwixt the King "and his Barons, who euen then as our Lords doe "now, demanded aid of the Maior and Commons "of London, against their Soueraigne King Henry "the third, and that in a cause rightfull, and good "for the Common-weale, which was the execution "of certain wholesome lawes, somwhat derogating "from his princely prerogatiue, which hee would "not permit. The aide was granted, and quarrell "came vnto battell, wherein the Lords preuailed, "and tooke the King and his sonne prisoners. But "they againe restored to liberty, among other con-"ditions this was one, that the King should not "onely grant his free pardon to the Lords, but also "vnto the Citizens of London; which was done, yea "and the same confirmed by Parliament. But what "followed? was it forgotten? no surely, nor ne-"uer forgiuen during the Kings life: for the liber-"ties of the City were taken away, strangers appoin-"ted to be our heads and Gouernours, the Citi-"zens giuen away both body and goods, and from "one persecution to another, were most miserably "afflicted: such it is to enter the wrath of a Prince, "which (as Salomon saith) is death: Wherefore, for-"asmuch as this aide is required of the Kings Maie-"sty, whose voice (being our high Shepheard) we "ought to obey, rather then to hearken to the "Lords, whom neuertheless I wish not to be vt-"terly cast off; my councell is, that they with vs, "and wee with them, become humble Petitioners "vnto his Highnesse, that it would please him to "heare such complaints against the Lord Protector, "as may be iustly alleaged & prooued, and I doubt "not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither "shall the King, nor yet the Lordes haue cause to "seeke for further aide, neither we to offend any of "them both.

(59) These words well weighed, and the Councel dissolued, fiue hundred Londoners were prepared in a readinesse: for Sir Philip Hobby being sent from the Lords to the King, so deliuered their minds, that the Lord Protector was cõmanded out of presence, and the next day being the twelfth of October, the Lords of the Councell resorted to Windsor, where they so wrought with the King, as his vncle was deliuered into their hands, whom the same night they imprisoned in Beauchamps Tower in the same Castell, and the next day strongly attended, brought him to London, whence the streets were guarded onely by housholders', the Aldermen taking the charge of the busines, and so to the great griefe and wondering of the people, he was conueyed to the Tower, and there left.

Iohn Stow.

The L. Protector committed to the Tower.

(60) Whither shortly after the Lords themselues repaired, and charged the Protector with these 20. Articles as followeth:

M. Fox in Acts & Mon.

Articles drawne against the Lord Protector.

1 That at his entry into that waighty office, hee was expresly prohibited to doe any thing in State without the assent of the last Kings Executors.

2 That hee had contrariwise vpon his owne authority both subuerted lawes, and staied iustice, as well by letters, as commandement.

3 That he had deliuered diuers persons arrested and committed to prison for felony, man-slaughter, murther and treason, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

4 That he had made Captaines and Lieutenants ouer waighty affaires vnder his owne Seale and Writing.

5 That hee had alone communicated with forraigne Ambassadors about most weighty State affaires.

6 That he had checked diuers of the Kings Priuy Councell, speaking for the good of the State, yea and threatned to displace them if they consented not to his mind.

7 That he had against law erected a Court of Requests in his owne house, whither were enforced diuers of the Kings Subiects to answere for their Free-holds.

8 That he had for money disposed Offices in the Kings gift, money, leases, and Wardes, and giuen presentations of Benefices, & Bishoprickes, yea and medled with sale of the Kings lands, which by office he could not, without consent of the Maior voice of the Councell.

9 That hee had commanded multiplication by Alcumistry, to the abuse of the Kings coine.

10 That against the King and Councels will, hee had set forth a Proclamatiõ against inclosures, which had caused dangerous insurrections in the Land, wherein diuers of the Kings liege Subiects haue been spoiled, and many a worthy man therein slaine.

11 That to the same end hee had giuen commission with Articles annexed concerning inclosures of Commons, high wayes, and decayed Cottages, giuing the Commissioners authority to heare and determine the same causes, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

12 That he had suffered Rebels and Traitors to assemble, and lie in Campe and Armour, against the King, his Nobles and Gentlemen, without any speedy suppressing of them.

13 That by his gifts in money, with promises of Fees, rewards and seruices, hee had encouraged many of the said rebels.

14 That in fauour of them contrary to law, he had caused a Proclamation to bee made, that none of the said Rebels, or Traitors should be sued, or vexed for any of their offences committed in the said Rebellion.

15 That hee had liked well of these rebellions, and had said, that the couetousnesse of the Gentry gaue the occasion, affirming that it was better for the Commons to die, then to perish for lacke of liuing.

16 That hee had reported the Lords of the Parliament were loth to reform themselues for the reformation of Inclosures, and therefore the people had good cause to reforme the things themselues.

17 That vpon the report of the defaults and lackes of Bulloigne, nothing was there amended.

18 That the Forts of Newhauen and Blackneſſe standing in want of men and victuall, whereof hee was informed, were suffered notwithstanding still to want, to the great encouragement of the French, and dishonour of the English.

19 That he had vntruly published, that the Lords at London minded to destroy the King, which he instantly desired he would neuer forget, and to that end instigated many young Lords, wherby sedition and discord was made among the Nobles.

20 Lastly, that whereas the Lords assembled at London, onely to consult vpon a charitable communication to be had with the Protector for his misgouernment of the King and Realme, hee contrariwise sent letters of credence to many places and persons, that the said Lords were no lesse then high Traitors to the King, and great disturbers of the whole Realme.

All these accusations notwithstanding (the young King so labouring it) he was released from the Tower the sixt of February following vnto his free liberty, though not vnto his former authority, and so remained remained vntouched for the ſpace of two yeeres and two dayes.

(61) Whileſt theſe his and other troubles were commencing in England, the Lord Grey of Wilton left Lieutenant of the North, remained in Scotland, where many feates of warre were vndergone, and many Forts fortified, and ſome taken, ſuch were Lowden, Hadington, and Teſter, at whoſe aſſault certaine opprobrious ſpeeches in moſt contemptuous manner were vttered by a Scotiſh man againſt King Edward of England, whereat the Lord Grey was ſo offended, as vpon compoſition for the deliuery of the Caſtell, all were let goe with life, onely that perſon excepted, and his name knowne to be Newton, was appointed to die for the ſame; but he denying the words, impoſed them vpon one Hamilton, a man valorous enough, and wrongfully touched, who denied the accuſation, and challenged Newton the combat, which he accepted, and in performance ſlew Hamilton, though more at diſaduantage, then for lacke either of courage or ſtrength: The victor was rewarded with a great chaine of gold, and the gowne that the Lord Grey ware at the preſent, though many maligned and accuſed him ſtill to be the vtterer of thoſe baſe words.

Pipin Fulwell.

A combate fought betweene two Scotiſhmen before the Lord Grey.

(62) The Engliſh keeping foot ſtill in Scotland, burnt Dawketh and Muskelburgh, and fortified Hadington both with munition and men, ſpoyling the Countrey, ſaith Biſhop Leſlie, all about Edenburgh, Lowthian and Mers: repayring of Forts, and placing of Garriſons, as if they meant there to remaine and abide: but their young Queene being conueyed into France, and the Scots aided with the aſſiſtance of the French, ſo quit themſelues, that they voided their Land of the Engliſh, and recouered of them all they had loſt. In which times of variable ſucceſſe, the King but a child, the Nobles at variances, and the combuſtuous Commons obedient to neither, the French ſought to recouer the holds that the Engliſh had in their Countrey, and firſt by ſtealth meant to ſurpriſe the fortreſſe of Rulloignberg, vnto which enterpriſe ſeuen thouſand were choſen, vnder the conduct of Monſieur Chatillon.

The Engliſh forced out of Scotland.

(63) Theſe ſecretly marching in the night with ladders and furniture meete for the enterprize, approched within a quarter of a mile vnto Bulloignberg fort, amongſt whom was an Engliſh Souldier diſcharged out of their pay, for that he had taken a French woman to wife. This Carter, for ſo was his name, got entertainment vnder Chatillon, and now vnderſtanding whereabout they went, haſtily made from his Company, and gaue the Alarum to his Countrimen within the Fort; where Sir Nicholas Arnalt Captaine of the Peece, cauſed him to be drawne vp betwixt two pikes to the height of the wall, vnto whom he declared the attempt in hand, and among them ſtood ſo valiantly in defence of the Fort, that he gaue many a wound, and receiued ſome himſelfe: by him and this meanes the Peece was quit from ſurpriſall, and the ſlaughter of the French ſo great, that fifteene Waggons went laden away with dead Corpes.

(64) This loſſe ſuſtained, and the Engliſh maſters in thoſe parts of their Maine, the French ſought to trie fortune for their Iſles in the Seas, namely, Garneſey and Ierſey, poſſeſt and ſubiect to King Edwards Crowne, their preparations were great, and their Marſhalliſts many; which notwithſtanding with ſuch loſſe were beaten backe from their bankes, as a thouſand men at Armes were ſlaine in the attempt, and the ſucceſſe ſo vnfortunate, as the French for feare of further diſcouragement, forbad the report, and made an inhibition, not to mention the expedition of that iourney.

The French aſſault the Iſles of Garneſey and Ierſey.

(65) Neuertheleſſe, the French King ceaſed not his deſired purpoſes, till hee had got by ſurrender Hambletowne, Blackneſſe, Bulloignberg, and the Towne of Builoigne it ſelfe, though bought at a deare rate, and deliuered with great griefe to the Engliſh; vnto ſuch a lamentable ſtate, and diſhonourable compoſition was the good King Edward brought, by the bandings of his great Councellors, and inſurrections of his vnruly Commons; after which calamities a great and mortall diſeaſe followed; namely the ſweating ſickneſſe, that raged extreamely through the Land, wherein dyed the two ſonnes of Charles Brandon, both of them Dukes of Suffolke, beſides an infinite number of men in their beſt ſtrengths, which followed onely Engliſhmen in forraine Countrey, no other people infected therewith, whereby they were both feared and ſhunned in all places where they came.

The ſweating ſickneſſe.

(66) And to fill vp the dolours of theſe dolefull times, the good Duke of Sommerſet was againe apprehended, euen when the leaſt ſuſpition was of any vndirect workings: for vpon his firſt releaſement, to linke a firme loue betwixt him and the potent Earle of Warwicke, his moſt malignant; a marriage was contracted betwixt the Lord Liſle his eldeſt ſonne and heire, and the Lady the Earles eldeſt daughter, which was ſolemnized with great ioy at Sheene, in preſence of the young King; this amity was outwardly carried with all faire ſhewes for a time, thogh inward hatred lay ſecretly hid, as by the ſequell incontinently appeared: for after a ſolemne creation of many Eſtates, wherein the Earle of Warwicke had his ſtyle raiſed to be Duke of Northumberland, (vnto whoſe rayes at that time moſt of the Courtiers caſt their eyes) the ſparkes of emulation began preſently to breake forth; where the ſimplicity of the one, gaue aduantage to the other, to compaſſe that which long had beene ſought.

John Stow.

(67) The Duke of Sommerſet not well aduiſed, and yeelding too much vnto Sycophant flatteries, was put in feare of ſome ſudden attempt intended againſt him, and therefore councelled to weare vnder his garment a coate of defence, which hee accordingly did, and being ſo armed, came vnto the Councell Table, ſuppoſing no man had knowne of any ſuch thing; but his boſome being opened, and the Armour perceiued, hee was forth-with apprehended, as intending the death of ſome Counſellor, and by Northumberland ſo vehemently taxed (who in Councell was euer the principall man) that he was forth-with attached, and ſent to the Tower, vpon the ſixteenth of October, with the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Miles Partridge, and the next day the Dutcheſſe his wife was likewiſe committed; all of them for ſuſpition of treaſon and felony; and he ſtanding ſo indited, vpon the * ſecond of December following, was arraigned at Weſtminſter, attended with the Axe of the Tower, Billes, Halberds, and Pollaxes a great number.

* Stow ſaith the firſt.

(68) His inditement was for treaſon and fellony, and the ſame vrged vnto extremity, with many amplifications, and bitter inuectiues, eſpecially that he had ſought and pretended the deaths of the Duke of Northumberland, the Lord Marqueſſe, and Pembrooke: where after many milde anſwers to theſe matters obiected, he put himſelfe to be tried by his Peeres, who acquitted him of treaſon, but found the inditement of felony: when preſently the Axe was commanded away, whereat the ſhout of the people ſhewed the great affection that was borne to the Duke: little miſtruſting that the ſentence of death was pronounced againſt him, or that the Kings Vncle ſhould die as a fellon; neither did the Statute intend any ſuch thing, as ſome are of opinion, but rather was purpoſely made for the ſuppreſſion of rebellions, and vnlawfull aſſemblies, wherein ſuch as ſhould ſeeke or procure the death of any Counſellor, ſhould be guilty as in caſe of felony. But ſuch was the pleaſure of the all ordering power, that he which knew no theft, ſhould die for that ſinne; ſo that neither himſelfe, nor his wiſeſt Councellors, demanded the benefit of his Clergy, which would haue ſaued his life, if it had beene required.

(69) His ſentence thus pronounced, hee was againe ſent backe to the Tower, wherein he kept a very ſad Chriſtmas, yea, and that in the Court, inclined to little mirth, (the King lamenting the condemnation of his Vncle) had not ſome witty diſports broke off his paſſions, which how, and by whom they proceeded, let others report, and vs continue the Tragedy of this Duke; who vpon the two and twenty of February following, being Friday, was brought to the Scaffold vpon Tower-hill, by eight in the morning, where turning himſelfe towards the Eaſt, he ſpake to the people, as followeth.

The Duke of Sommerſets ſpeech at his death.

(70) Dearely beloued friends, I am brought hither to ſuffer death, albeit I neuer offended againſt the King, neither in word nor deed, and haue alwayes beene as faithfull and true vnto this Realme, as any man hath beene: but foraſmuch as I am by law condemned to die, I doe acknowledge my ſelfe as well as others to bee ſubiect thereunto: wherefore to teſtifie mine obedience which I owe to the lawes, I am come hither to ſuffer death, whereunto I willingly offer my ſelfe, with moſt hearty thankes vnto God, that hath giuen mee this time of repentance, who might through ſudden death haue taken away my life, that I neither ſhould haue acknowledged him, nor my ſelfe.

A great feare without any cauſe.

(71) Theſe words vttered, beſides others exhortatory, that the people would continue conſtant in the Goſpel, ſuddenly was heard a great noyſe, whereby the aſſembly was ſtrucke into great feare, ſome thinking that a ſtorme or tempeſt deſcended from aboue, ſome ſuppoſed that the barrels of Gunpowder in the Armory had taken fire, & were all blowne vp into the Ayre, others thought that they heard a noyſe of Horſes prepared to battell, ſome againe affirmed confidently, that it did thunder, and others thought verily it was an earth-quake, and that the ground moued: vnto ſuch confuſion and terrour were they preſently brought, which (ſaith Stow) was none other, but that certaine men from the Hamlets warned with weapon to guard the Tower-hill, came thither ſomewhat after the houre appointed, whoſe formoſt ſeeing the Priſoner on the Scaffold, beganne to runne forward themſelues, and call to their fellowes to come away: which word away, ſounding as an Eccho in the peoples eares, they thought that reſcue had come to the Duke to take him away: and ſeeing the Bil-men to make forward ſo faſt, beganne themſelues to ſhrinke backe from the hill, euery man ſeeking to ſaue one, and by this accident and confuſed cries, this feare among them fell and beganne: This ſtirre ſcarce ended, another enſued by the running of the people towards the Scaffold, who ſeeing Sir Anthony Browne riding thitherward, ſuppoſed a pardon had come from the King, ſo that a ſudden ſhout aroſe, A pardon, a pardon, God ſaue the King; by which it onely appeared in what loue hee was had, and how much his life was deſired of the Commons.

Iohn Stow in Annales.

The Duke entirely beloued of the Commons.

(72) The Duke whoſe minde being altogether prepared for death, was little moued either to hope or feare, and thereupon addreſſed his ſecond ſpeech to the people, and with no deiected countenance ſpake againe and ſaid: Beloued friends there is no ſuch matter intended as you vainely hope and beleeue: It ſeemeth thus good to the Almighty, vnto whoſe ordinance it is meet that wee all be obedient, wherefore I pray you be quiet and without tumult, for I am quiet, and let vs ſo ioyne in prayer vnto the Lord, for the preſeruation of our Noble King, vnto whoſe Maieſty I wiſh continuall health, with all felicitie and abundance of proſperous ſucceſſe. Moreouer, I wiſh to his Councellors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule all things vprightly with Iuſtice, vnto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to ſhew your ſelues obedient, the which is alſo very neceſſarie for you, vnder paine of condemnation, and alſo moſt profitable for the preſeruation of the Kings Maieſtie. And thereupon asking euery man forgiueneſſe, freely forgaue euery man againſt him, and deſiring the people to be quiet, leſt the fleſh ſhould be troubled, though his ſpirit was willing, hee meekely laide downe his head to the Axe, and receiued at one ſtroke his reſt by death.

The Dukes ſecond ſpeech vpon the Scaffold.

(73) Howſoeuer this Dukes cauſe was ballanced by law, and him taken away that ſtood betwixt ſome and their Sunne; yet was his death heauily diſgeſted by the people, that ſpake very bitterly againſt the Duke of Northumberland; but moſt eſpecially the young King ſore mourned, and ſoone miſſed the life of his Protector thus vnexpectedly taken away, who now depriued of both his Vncles, howſoeuer the times were paſſed with paſtimes, playes, and ſhewes, to driue away dumpes, yet euer the remembrances of them ſate ſo neere vnto his heart, that laſtly he fell ſicke of a Cough, which grieuouſly increaſing, ended with a conſumption of the lungs.

The Duke of Sommerſet ſoone miſt, and ſore lamented.

King Edward falleth ſicke.

(74) His ſickneſſe continuing with great doubt of his life, vpon purpoſe, ſaith Grafton, to alter the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, three mariages were in one day ſolemnized, whereof the firſt was betwixt the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth ſonne to the Duke of Northumberland, and the Lady Iane, eldeſt daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolke: the ſecond was betwixt the Lord Herbert, ſonne and heire to William Earle of Pembrook, and the Lady Katherine, the yonger daughter of the ſaid Duke of Suffolke, and the third was betweene Henry Lord Haſtings, ſonne and heire of Frances Earle of Huntington, and Katherine the youngeſt daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which tending (ſaith he) to the diſheriſon of the rightfull heires, they proued nothing proſperous, for two of them were preſently made fruſtrate, the one by death, and the other by diuorce.

Three mariages entended to reuert the ſucceſſion.

(75) The policy eſtabliſhed, and languiſhing ſickneſſe of the King gaue way vnto ſuch, as ſought the euerſion of the State, and alienation of the Crowne: In whoſe eye no head was ſeene fitter for that faire Diademe, then was Guilfords Bride, Iane the elder daughter of Suffolke, whoſe mother, Lady Francis then liuing, was the daughter of Mary, the French Queene, the younger ſiſter to King Henry the eight, vnto whom King Edward ouer-wrought in his weakneſſe, ordained his Crowne by Will, at the ſuggeſtions of ſuch Politiques, as meant to diſherite the two lawfull Princes, Mary and Elizabeth, and to impugne the Statute, in caſe prouided for the ſucceſſion of King Henry the eight his Children: vnto which Will (O griefe to heare) ſubſcribed all the Kings Councell, moſt of the Nobility, the reuerend Biſhops, and all the Iudges of the Land, one onely excepted, euen Sir Iames Halles Knight, a Iuſtice of the Common Pleas, vpright in iudgement, and a fauourer of the Goſpell, he, I ſay, neuer would write or conſent to the diſheriting of the Lady Mary.

Sir Iames Halles refuſed to ſubſcribe to K. Edwards Will.

(76) The King thus accompliſhing what his Statiſts had wrought, lay languiſhing in his faintneſſe: the end whereof could not be expected but onely by death, and now being worne almoſt to nothing (his laſt breath drawing to the limits of Nature) hee lift vp his eyes with a prepared heart, and prayed as followeth.

King Edwards Prayer.

Lord God deliuer mee out of this miſerable and wretched life, and take me among thy Choſen: howbeit not my will, but thy will be done; Lord I commit my ſpirit to thee: O Lord thou knoweſt how happy it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy Choſen ſake, if it be thy will, ſend me life and health, that I may truly ſerue thee: O my Lord bleſſe thy people, and ſaue thine inheritance: O Lord God ſaue thy Choſen people of England. O my Lord God, defend this Realme from Papiſtrie, and maintaine thy true Religion, that I and my people may praiſe thy holy Name, for thy Sonne Ieſus Chriſts ſake.

So turning his face, and ſeeing ſome by him, ſaid; I thought you had not beene ſo nigh: yes, ſaid Doctor Owen, we heard you ſpeake to your ſelfe; then ſaid the King, I was praying to God: O I am faint, Lord haue mercy vpon me, and receiue my ſpirit: and in ſo ſaying, gaue vp the Ghoſt, to the great loſſe of England, in whom they had conceiued moſt hopes.

moſt Princes; and vices ſo few, that none can be taxed with leſſe; very learned (according to his yeeres) he was in the Latine and Greek tongues, the French, Spaniſh, and Italian, yea (and ſaith Hieronymus Cardanus) he was adorned with the skill of Logicke, naturall Philoſophie, and Muſicke, and for Aſtronomy (ſaith he) my ſelfe had experience, whom he learnedly oppoſed of the cauſe and courſe of Comets: for Humanity, he is the very Image of Morality, and in Princely graue Maieſty beſt beſeeming a King: briefly, he may well ſeeme to be a miracle in Nature: nor doe I ſpeake thus Rhetorically to amplifie things, or to make them more then truth is, for the truth is more then I doe vtter: and in this hee was moſt admirable, that hee could tell and recite all the Ports, Hauens, and Creekes, not within his owne Realme onely, but alſo in Scotland, and likewiſe in France, what comming in there was, how the tide ſerued in euery of them, what burden of Shippe, and what winde beſt ſerued the comming in into them.

(78) Of all his Nobles, Gentry, Iuſtices, and Magiſtrates, hee tooke ſpeciall name of their Hoſpitality, and religious conuerſations, and that which is beſt accepted of a Prince, hee was very liberall, louing, mercifull, meeke, and gentle towards his people, and ſo farre from bloud, as he euer fauoured and ſpared as much as might be the life of man, yea, euen of Rebels, as we haue ſeene; neither was hee willing to put Heretikes to death, as in a certaine diſſertation had once with Maſter Cheeke it appeared: inſomuch that when Ioan Butcher ſhould bee burned for her hereſie, all the Councell could not moue him to ſet his hand to the warrant of her execution, vntill Doctor Cranmer his Godfather, Archbiſhop of Canterbury laboured to induce him, vnto whom he ſaid, what my Lord, will you haue me to ſend her quicke to hell? and taking the pen, vſed this ſpeech: I will lay all the charge hereof vpon Cranmer before God. Then how his hand had beene gotten for his Vncles death, is to be admired.

(79) But his conſtancy vnto Chriſts Goſpell, with the abandoning of all ſuperſtition, was very admirable, one example among many wee will not let to declare. Lady Mary his ſiſter through the ſuit of Charles the Emperour, made great meanes to haue Maſſe ſaid in her Houſe, and that to be done without all preiudice of law: the greatneſſe of her perſon being the immediate ſucceſſor, and the might of the Emperour in amity with England, moued the Councell to giue their conſent to the ſuit; to forward which, Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, accompanied with Ridley Biſhop of London, were imployed from them to the King, who hearing their meſſage, gaue the replication ſo grounded vpon Scripture, as they gaue ouer to vrge more that way: but like Politicians alleaged the danger in breach of amity with the Emperour, to which the King anſwered, he would rather aduenture the hazard of his owne life, then to grant that which was not agreeable to the truth. The Biſhops yet vrged him with the bonds of nature, and ſubmiſſiuely ſaid, they would haue no nay: the King ſeeing himſelfe ſo importunated, burſt into weeping, and ſobbingly deſired them to be content, whereat the teares ſo abundantly burſt from their eyes, as they departed his preſence not able to ſpeake. And for a further teſtimony of this yong Kings zeale, reade if you pleaſe a letter ſent vnto his ſiſter the Princeſſe Lady Mary, out of the originall.

(80) Right deare, and right entirely beloued ſiſter, we greet you well, and let you know that it grieueth vs much to perceiue no amendment in you of that, which wee for good cauſe, your ſoules health, our conſcience, and common tranquillity of our Realme haue ſo long deſired; aſſuring you, that our ſufferance hath more demonſtration of naturall loue, then contentation of our conſcience, and foreſight of our ſafety. Wherefore, although you giue vs occaſion aſmuch almoſt as in you is, to diminiſh our naturall loue; yet be we loath to feele it decay, and meane not to be ſo careleſſe of you as we be prouoked. And therefore meaning your weale, and therewith ioyning a care not to be found guilty in our owne conſcience to God, hauing cauſe to require forgiueneſſe, that wee haue ſo long for reſpect of loue towards you, omitted our bounden duty, we doe ſend at this preſent our right truſty, and right well beloued Councellor, the Lord Rich, our Chancellor of England, our truſty and right welbeloued Councellor, Sir Anthony Wingfield Knight, Comptroler of our Houſhold, and Sir Will. (81) The fruites of which Religion, this godly King ſhewed by his workes of compaſſion towards the poore, and that eſpecially vpon the foundation of Chriſts Hoſpitall, the late ſuppreſſed place of the Grey-Fryers in London, vpon occaſion as followeth. It chanced the reuerend Biſhop Doctor Ridley to preach before his Maieſty at Weſtminſter, wherein hee Chriſtianlike exhorted the rich to be mercifull vnto the poore, and to that end amplified the words of the Text againſt the mercileſſe rich, and the negligence of ſuch as were in great place. The Sermon ended, and the King ſet to dinner, he ſent to the Biſhop, commanding him not to depart the Court, before hee knew his further pleaſure, and thereupon cauſing two Chaires to be ſet in the Gallery, all others auoided, he compelled the Biſhop to ſit downe by his ſide, and in no wiſe would admit him to be vncouered.

D. Ridleyes ſermon before King Edward.

(82) Where entring conference, he firſt gaue him hearty thankes for his Sermon, repeating vnto him the chiefe points thereof, and comming to his exhortation for the poore, he then told him that hee thought himſelfe firſt touched in the ſpeech; for ſaid he, my Lord, you ſpeake to them in authority, whereof vnder God I am the chiefe, and muſt firſt make anſwere to him if I be negligent, and therefore I thinke you principally meant me: Gods commandement I know moſt expreſly inioyneth vs to haue compaſſion of his poore members, for whom we muſt make account; and truly my Lord, I am moſt willing to trauell that way, not doubting but that your long approued learning and wiſdome, whoſe zeale is ſuch as wiſheth them helpe; but that alſo you had conference with others what is beſt herein to be done, which I am alſo deſirous to know, and therefore I pray ſay freely your mind.

The conference betwixt the King and Biſhop Ridley.

(83) The mouer vnto theſe pious conſiderations little looking for ſuch queſtions of the Prince, ſate a while ſilent, ouerioyed at his words, and laſtly, vnprepared of any preſent inſtructions, told the King that the Citizens of London were beſt able to direct the plot, whoſe great charity, and well ordered gouernement, beſides their daily charges, being ouerburdened with poore, had ſufficient experience, and if it would pleaſe his Maieſty to direct his letters vnto them himſelfe, he would be very ready to further this godly reſolution ſo far as his meanes might any wiſe extend: whereupon the King preſently commanded his letters to be writ, and would not ſuffer the Biſhop to depart before himſelfe had thereto ſet his hand and ſignet, deſiring him to deliuer the ſame to the Lord Maior, and with him to conferre about this buſineſſe, which hee wiſhed might be accompliſhed with all expedition.

King Edwards great care for the poore.

(84) The Biſhop as ready as the King was deſirous, poſted apace to the Lord Maior of London, where deliuering the letter, offered his aſſiſtance to forward the worke, and they together with ſome Aldermen, and twenty foure Commoners agreed vpon three degrees of the poore, and them diuided againe into nine.

King Edwards letter deliuered to the L. Maior.

(85) The Booke thus drawne, and preſented to the King, he thereupon deſired to be accounted the chiefe Founder of their reliefe, and forth-with gaue vnto the City S. Bartholmewes Hoſpitall by Smithfield, and the Grey-Fryers Church neere adioyning, 86) The Kings charitable gifts confirmed by Charter, and a Petition exhibited for liberty to take in Mortmaine of lands to a yeerely value without further licence, a place being left in the Patent to containe the summe, King Edward presently called for penne and inke, and with his owne hand filled vppe the space with these words, foure thousand Markes by yeere: which done, hee burst foorth and said; Lord God I yeeld thee most heartie thankes, that thou hast giuen me life thus long to finish this worke to the glory of thy name.

(87) Now as this godly King was carefull in redeeming the time, so likewise to take as it were an account of himselfe, hee kept a iournall booke or Record written with his owne hand, how all things proceeded with him, and with the State, euen from the first day of his raigne vnto his death: whose many vertues as they were inferior to none of his worthy Progenitors, and zeale little short to the best Kings of Iudah, so was hee soone mist of all his loyall Subiects, when the bosome of Gods Saints were opened to the persecutors swords.

CHAPTER XXIII.

KING EDWARDS life ended by his lingring diſeaſe, and the Stateſmen intending to eſtabliſh his will; for the ſpace of two dayes his death was kept ſecret, and much conſultation among the Nobility had of the buſineſſe; all of them affecting the election of Iane, leſt Mary ſhould vndoe what Edward had done; to ſupport which purpoſe, many proiects were caſt, and many opinions giuen how to proceed, yet all ioyntly light in this point, that London was the hand which muſt reach Iane the Crowne: whoſe Citizens aſſiſtance if they might be got, the greateſt difficulty (as they held it) was halfe vndergone. (6) The Lords at London to set their enterprise vpon foot, by proclamation made knowne in most parts of the City, the death of King Edward, and that by Will, hee had bequeathed his Crowne and Dominions, to the vertuous great Princesse, Lady Iane, daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolke (as wee haue said) and so was shee proclaimed by the name of Queene Iane, though many of the Commons wished it had beene Queene Mary; and for some words spoken to that purpose, one Gilbert Pot a seruant Vintner, vpon the Pillory lost both his eares. Vnto the aide of Lady Mary came the Earles of Sussex, Bath, and Oxford, the Lord Wentworth, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Sir Henry Iernyngham, Sir William Walgraue, with diuers others of Norfolke and Suffolke, yea and the Citizens of Norwich themselues, hauing certaine knowledge of King Edwards death, forthwith proclaimed Marie for Queene, and presently sent her aide both of men and munition. The Lords then hearing of great preparations, meant by times to ouermatch her in power, and thereupon agreed that Henry Duke of Suffolke their new Queenes Father should with an Army repaire into Norfolke; which thing was so greeuous vnto Lady Iane his daughter, that with flouds of teares shee obtained his stay.

Mary proclaimed Queene first in Norwich Iuly 12.

(7) None then was held fitter to vndergoe this great businesse, then was the Duke of Northumberland, young Gilfords Father, (who besides his sonnes dignity, vnto whom this new Queene was wife) his valiant parts and sufficiency to marshall an Army in Field, had been often experienced in Scotland, & but lately among these people with whom he was now to deale. The Duke thus appointed, beganne as it should seeme, to mistrust the worst, and thereupon freely vttered his minde to the Lords; willing them to be carefull at home, as hee would bee venturous abroad, for their cause was common, and all for the Queene. Hee with his (hee said) went now to venture their bodies to the bloody strokes of warre, their Families and Children left to the dispose of others, whom as he told them; if they meant not faire play, hee could auoid as well as any: thus much and more spoken to the like purpose, one of the Lords replied, and said: Your Grace (as I iudge) doth cast this doubt ouer farre, for which of vs all, can wash our hands cleane of this businesse, therefore it behoueth vs to bee resolute, as much as it doth you: and among them Arundel wished that he might goe with him.

The Duke of Northumberland assigned Lord Lieutenant for Queene Iane.

(8) All things in a readinesse, and his commission confirmed vnder the broad Seale of England, vpon the 14. of Iuly the Duke with fiue hundred men, accompanied with the Lord Grey, and others, set foorth of London, and tooke his way through Shorditch where beholding the countenances of the people, he spake to the Lord Grey and said: The people my Lord, praise still to see vs, but not one of them bids vs God speede: the same day likewise Sir Iohn Gates went after the Duke, both of them making for New market, whither further supplies were promised to be sent.

(9) In the meane time the Lord Windsore, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drurie, and Sir Edward Hastings raised the Commons of Buckinghamshire, proclaiming Queene Marie euer as they went, the like did Sir Iohn Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine in Oxfordshire, and so did Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton: these with many more made forward toward Norfolke, vnto whom many more ioined in the way: and as God and good hap brought it to passe, fiue tall Ships well manned that were appointed before Yarmouth to haue taken Lady Mary if shee had fled, were by foule weather driuen into the Hauen, where master Iermingham was raising for her, and taking a Boate to halle them, the Sea-souldiers demanded what he would haue, his answer was their Captaines, whereunto the Souldiers consented, threatning to throw them into the Sea, if they refused to serue Queene Marie: the Shippes thus gotten, and their number augmented, their terror grew fearefull to the Lords in the Tower: whose Tenants began then likewise to draw backe, and deny them their aide: so that certaine of them would faine haue been gone, if by any meanes they could haue escaped the Tower, which the Lord Treasurer assaied, but was brought backe againe about midnight.

Fox Act. & Mon.

(10) The Duke of Northumberland in as great feare as any, tooke ſtill his ſtations according to his Commiſſion, ſending ſtill to the Lords for their promiſed ſupplies, betwixt whom were ſuch poſting of letters, ſuch ſpeeding to & fro, ſuch outward faire promiſes, ſuch inward priuy practiſes, ſuch talking of the Souldiers, and ſuch heart-burning of the people, as it was a world to ſee: and the rumour of Souldiers from all quarters daily reſorting vnto Queene Marie, made the turmoile much the more. To leaue therefore nothing vnaſſaied that might ſupport their new made Queene Iane, the Councell commanded Doctor Ridley Biſhop of London, to maintaine her cauſe in his Sermon made at Pauls Croſſe, which hee did vpon Sunday the ſixteenth of Iuly, but that neither working, nor the peoples affection drawne from the rightfull Succeſſor, the Lords fell from the Duke, who then was in Buric; and in London proclaimed Lady Marie Queene.

(11) This ſudden alteration brought many ſudden feares into the Dukes breaſt, whoſe onely way, as he well ſaw, was to follow the ſtreame, and now returning to Cambridge, his Souldiers began to turne in affection, moſt of them forſaking his company, a few onely excepted, whoſe perils were deepely engaged with his, where to ſhew his forwardneſſe for the aduancement of Marie, wanting both Trumpet and Herault at hand, himſelfe accompanied with the Maior, and the Marqueſſe of Northampton, in the Market place proclaimed her Queene: which done in token of ioy, hee threw hp his owne Cap. And thus the right reuerted to whom it belonged, wee will now addreſſe our ſtile to her dreadfull Raigne, wherein the Kingdomes ſtory may ſeeme to be writ rather with bloud then with inke, and the nurſing mother, (as Queenes by the Prophet are termed and called) to forget the naturall affection due to her Subiects, which in ſome ſort may bee compared to the children of her wombe.

(12) Yet were her beginnings both milde and gentle, pardoning all offenders in caſe of Lady Iane; excepting the Duke of Northumberland, the onely doer, and Sir Iohn Gates, Captaine of the Guard, who was in Armes againſt her; with ſome few others that worthily ſuffered for that offence. The Duke (as is ſaid) laying downe weapon, and himſelfe proclaiming Queene Marie, was neuertheleſſe arreſted with Francis Earle of Huntington in the Kings College at Cambridge by a Sergant at Armes, but letters being then ſent from the Counſel, that euery man ſhould be diſmiſſed without further trouble, the Duke among them was alſo releaſed.

This done, the Headſman kneeled downe, and askt her forgiueneſſe, vnto whom ſhee ſaid; the Lord forgiue thee, and I doe: and I pray thee diſpatch me quickly; and kneeling againe, ſaid, will you take it off before I lye downe? he anſwered, no Madam. "you will shew your selues so to me his daughter;
"which if you doe, then may you not suffer any
"rebell to vsurpe the Gouernment of our Person,
"or interpose our estate, especially so presumptu-
"ous a Traytor as this Wyat hath shewed himselfe
"to be: who most certainly, as he hath abused our "ignorant Subiects, to be adherents to his traiterous
"quarrel; so doth he intend by the color of the same,
"to subdue the lawes to his will, and to giue scope
"to the rascall and forlorne persons, to make gene"rall hauocke and spoile of your goods. And this I "say further vnto you in the word of a Prince, I can"not tell how naturally a Mother loueth her Chil"dren, for I was neuer the Mother of any; but cer"tainly if a Prince and Gouernour may as naturally
"loue the Subiects, as the Mother doth her child,
"then assure your selues, that I being your Soue-"raigne Lady, and Queene, doe as earnestly and "tenderly loue and fauour your. And I thus louing
"you, cannot but thinke, that you as heartily and "faithfully loue me againe: and so this loue bound "together in the knot of concord, we shall be able I "doubt not, to giue these Rebels a short and speedy "ouerthrow. Now as concerning my intended "marriage, you shall vnderstand, that I entred not "into the treaty thereof, without the aduice of our "priuy Councel, yea, & by assent of those, to whom
"my Father committed his trust, who haue so consi"dered the great commodities that may thereof en-
"sue, as they not onely haue thought it very honou"rable, but also expedient, both for the Wealth of "our Realme, and also of our louing Subiects. But "as touching my selfe (I assure you) I am not so de"sirous of wedding, neither am so precisely wedded
"to my will, that either for mine owne pleasure I wil
"chuse where I list, or else so amorous, as needs I "must haue one: for I thanke God (to whom be the "praise) I haue hitherto liued a Virgin, and doubt "not but with Gods grace to be able to liue so still.
"But if (as my Progenitors haue done before) it "might please God that I might leaue some fruit
"of my body to be your Gouernour, I trust you "would not onely reioyce thereat, but also I know
"it would be to your great comfort: and certainly
"if I either did know or thinke, that this marriage "should either turne to the danger, or losse of any "of you my louing Subiects, or to the detriment of "any part of the Royal Estate of this English Realme,
"I would neuer consent thereunto, neither would "I euer marry whilest I liued. And in the word of a "Queene, I promise and assure you, that if it shall not "probably appeare before the Nobility and Com"mons in the high Court of Parliament, that this "marriage shall be for the singular benefit and com"modity of the whole Realme; that then I will ab-
"staine not onely from this marriage, but also from "any other. Wherefore good Subiects, plucke vp "your hearts, and like true men stand fast with your "lawfull Prince against these Rebels, both ours and
"yours, and feare them not, for (I assure you) I doe
"not: and will leaue with you my Lord Howard, and
"my Lord Treasurer, to be assistant with my Lord
"Maior, for the safegard of the City from spoile
"and sackage, which is the onely scope of this re"bellious Company.

(37) The Oration ended, and the Citizens well pleased, Queene Mary with good content returned to the Court, where conferring with her Councell, shee ordained the Lord William Herbert, Earle of Pembrooke, Generall of the Field, and gaue forth Proclamation, that whosoeuer could bring Wyat either quicke or dead, should be rewarded with an hundred pound Lands by yeere, to him and his posterity for euer.

The Earle of Pembrooke made Lord Generall. R. Grafton.

(38) Wyat in Depford, and knowing what was done, with foureteene Ensignes, and foure thousand strong, vpon Saturday the third of February, marched towards London, at whose approch, the White Tower hauing him in danger, shot off her Ordinance, but did misse their marke, some leuelling too farre ouer, and some as much too short. His entrance into Southwarke was peaceable, and without all resistance, though many Countrey-men were therein bestowed to with-stand his comming, who contrary to trust, ioyned with the Kentish, and then to winne the hearts of the people, he presently made Proclamation, that no Souldier should take away any thing without due payment, and the parties consent: notwithstanding Winchester House soone felt the contrary, whose goods were ransacked, the Bookes in the Library cut and defaced, and not a locke left vpon the doores: such spoiles insurrections euer aime at, how faire soeuer they foyle the glasse to the sight.

Stow hath but fiue Ensignes, & two thousand souldiers.

(39) The Suburbs thus his, he assured himselfe the City likewise shortly would be, but comming to the Bridge, he found the Gates fast shut, neither any in hast to open them for him, therefore making a trench at the Bridge-foote, planted two Peeces of Ordinance against the Gate: At S^t Georges Church he mounted another, the fourth at the entrance into Barmondsey-streete, and the fift towards the Bishop of Winchesters House.

Wyat fortifieth Southwarke. Iohn Stow.

(40) Within the City the Lord Maior, and Lord William Howard, caused the draw-bridge to be cut downe, and making fortifications for their defence, placed great Ordinance against the entrance. Wyat still thirsting to know the Cities intent, got with some few followers through the Porters lodge vnto the draw-bridge, where being vnseene himselfe, saw the passage too difficult to haue friendly accesse, and thereupon said to his consorts, This place is too hot for vs. Besides, the Tower began to be topped with Ordinance, seauen Culuerings and Demy Cannons leuelled against the Bridge-foote, the Steeples of Saint Olaues, and Saint Mary Oueries; all the White-Tower laden with her Peeces, three Fawconers ouer the water-Gate, and a double Culuering vpon Diuelling Tower: and all these were turned and fearefully charged vpon the Borough of Southwarke, which seene, the Inhabitants with great lamentations came vnto Wyat, and complayned, that for his cause they were like to be vtterly vndone; who strucken with pitty and remorse of so many, presently remoued his Army towards Kingston vpon Thames, where finding the Bridge broken downe, with Ladders and Planks he soone repaired it, and so passing the Riuer the same night, came to Braineford before he was descried by the Queenes Scoutes, the newes whereof sore troubled the Court. Wyats hopes were to haue surprised the City vpon the sudden, and therefore made such haste as he did, but being hindred by a Peece of great Ordinance, that was dismounted from the carriage, came not vnto Knights-bridge before it was day.

(41) In the same morning the Earle of Pembrook, Lord Generall, had taken Saint Iames Fields, whither Wyat and his in good order marched, but seeing the way fore-laid both with foote and horsemen, turned downe the olde lane directly towards Saint Iames, whence Captaine Vaughan with two Ensignes tooke towards Westminster, and Wyat along the causey leading to Charing-Crosse; the Lord Generals Horsemen, hitherto stood houering aloofe, vntill the enemy was passed, all but the taile, vpon which they violently set, and seuered from the rest, the maine neuer looking backe to releeue their distresse.

(42) From the higher ground, and along the high way, the great Ordinance played, and Wyats againe answered the like, though with small hurt to either, onely one from the Hill slew three of Wyats men in a ranke, and strucke through the Bricke-wall into the Parke. Wyat passing forward by the battell of footmen, without any impeachment, came to Charing-Crosse, where the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir Iohn Gage, stood ready to resist him: but the Kentish Souldiers rushing violently into the streets, forced them into the gates of White-Hall, which presently were shut, and a report in the Court that the Lord Generall was reuolted to Wyat; all so distracted, that none durst trust others, and no other voice therein heard, but Treason, Treason. Meane while Wyat, with such small company as he had, hasted through Fleet-street, and came vnto Ludgate, where he knocked to haue entrance, and well hoped of further assistance, but was farre deceiued, the gate being guarded against him, with a number of true Citizens, and Bands of the Queenes friends.

Wyat commeth to Ludgate.

(43) But those straglers that had taken into Westminster, whereof Kneuet was Captaine, seeking to recouer their companions, came before the Court gates, and there made their stand, which being shut against them, shot many of their arrowes into the Garden, yea, and into the windowes of White-hall, though without any hurt: from the Court thus guarded against them, they forth-with departed, meaning to follow Wyat their Leader into London, and marching forward, were met with at Charing-Crosse, by Sir Henry Iernyngham, Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the Ordinance, and Sir Philip Paris Knights, sent thither by order of the Lord Generall, with a band of Archers, and certaine Field Peeces to secure the Court; their Artillery discharged, they presently ioyne fight with the Rebels at pushe of the Pike, who a while stucke to it manfully; in which conflict was the triall of the day: but as their quarrell was trayterous, so their hearts were soone quelled, each one sauing himselfe by flight, wherein about twenty of those bemired Souldiers were slaine, and no other cry heard, but downe with the Draggle-tailes.

The conflict at Charing-Crosse.

(44) Wyat returned from Ludgate, sate downe vpon a stall against the common Inne called Belsauage, where he began (as it should seeme) to expostulate what his heady rashnesse had done, and the vaine hopes he had conceiued of the Citizens abetments, who seldome take part against the Crowne: he then despairing of further successe, retired backe towards the Court, and was not stayed vntill hee came to Temple-Barre, where certaine Horsemen comming from the Field, met him full in the face, betwixt whom began some bickering, till lastly Clarentius, King at Armes, came to him, and said; Master Wyat you see the day is gone against you, and in resisting you can doe no good, but hazard the death of your Souldiers, and your selfe, to the great perill of your soule. My counsell is, that you were best to yeelde, and perchance you may finde the Queene mercifull, if you stay from further bloudshed.

Wyat returneth from Ludgate.

(45) Wyat hereat somewhat astonied, seeing now his whole designes defeated (though his few Souldiers were bent still to fight) answered the Herauld, Well then, If I must needes yeeld, I will yeeld to a Gentleman: to whom Sir Maurice Barkley came presently, and bad him mount his Horse behinde, in like manner another tooke vp Sir Thomas Cobham, and the third Thomas Kneuet, and so carried them vnto the Court, whence in the afternoone, they with the two Mantels, and Alexander Bret, were committed to the Tower, Sir Thomas Wyat wearing a shirt of Male vnder a veluet Cassocke, and the wind-lace of his Dagge hanging about his necke. The next day eleuen Gentlemen more of name and account, were likewise committed to the Tower. In London about fifty persons were hanged for Wyats conspiracie, and foure hundred more led through the City with halters about their neckes to Westminster, where in the Tilt-yard they were all pardoned by the Queene, pronouncing her mercy from the Gallery aboue.

Wyat yeeldeth himselfe.

400 persons pardoned by the Queene.

(46) But the Capitall offender Sir Thomas Wyat arraigned at Westminster vpon case of high Treason, confessed the inditement, and had iudgement of death accordingly, which he suffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill, the eleuenth of April following, his words to the people were these; "Good peo-"ple, I am come hither presently to die, being there-"to lawfully and worthily condemned, for I haue "sore offended against God and the Queenes Maie-"stie; I trust God hath forgiuen me, and will take "mercy vpon me; I beseech the Queenes Maiesty "also of forgiuenesse (shee hath forgiuen you quoth "Doctor Weston) let euery man beware how he ta-"keth any thing in hand against the higher Powers, "vnlesse God be prosperable to his purpose, it will "neuer take good effect or successe, whereof you "may now learne by me, and I pray God I may be "the last example in this place. But where it is said, "and noysed abroad, that I should accuse the Lady "Elizabeth and the Lord Courtney, it is not so, good "people: For I assure you, neither they, nor any o-"ther now yonder in hold, was priuy to my rising "before I began, as I haue declared no lesse to the "Queenes Councell, and that is most true. Then said Doctor Weston, marke here my masters, he saith that, that which he hath shewed to the Councell in writing of them, is most true. Whereupon Wyat put off his Gowne, his doublet, and wast-coate, and knitting a kercheefe ouer his eyes, with most feruent prayers, receiued the stroke of the Axe.

(47) Alexander Bret, and twenty two Kentish persons besides, were executed in diuers parts of that County: others were likewise arraigned for the same Conspiracy, as Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and Sir Iames Croft, the one quit by his Inquest, the other pardoned of life by the Queene. Many others were suspected as ayders vnto Wyat, and his enterprise, among whom the Lord Courtney, and the Princesse Elizabeth, sister to the Queene, were not the least, and therefore both of them committed to the Tower: of which Ladies troubles, innocency, and truth, thus we find related.

Sir Nich. Throck-morton and Sir Iames Croft arraigned.

Lady Elizabeths troubles.

(48) These Virgine Princes were not so neerely linked in bloud and nature, as they were separated asunder in affecting Religion, and that being the prime cause for which these commotions were raised, Queene Mary much suspected her sister to be a principall mouer therein. The iealousie whereof, Gardiner of Winchester did further inflame, by blowing Coniectures into her eare: so that needes the Princesse must be sent for, then lying sicke at her Mannor of Ashridge, euen the next day after that Wyat rose. The messengers were, Sir Iohn Williams, Sir Edward Hastings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, all three Priuy Counsellors, with a troope of Horsemen, in number two hundred and fifty.

Lady Elizabeth sore sicke is sent for.

(49) These comming to Ashridge at ten in the night, suddenly ascended into her Priuy Chamber, and making it knowne they came from the Queene, had present accesse into her Bed-Chamber; where the said Lady lay very sore sicke: their first salutations were, that they were sorry to see her in that estate, and I am not glad, said shee, to see you here at this time of the night; Madam, quoth they, our Message requires haste, and the Queenes pleasure is, that you shall bee at London the seuenth of this moneth. No Creature gladder to come to her Maiesty then I (said Lady Elizabeth) being right sorry that I am not in case at this time to attend her Grace, as your selues here see. Indeed (said they) for that we see, we are heartily sorry, but our commission is, that wee bring you to London either quicke or dead, whereat shee being greatly amazed, sorrowfully said, shee well hoped their commission was nothing so ſtrait, but they calling for two Doctors of Phiſick, demanded whether ſhee might be remoued with life, and that being reſolued, bad her prepare againſt the next morning, and ſo left this innocent Princeſſe very ſore perplexed the reſt of the night.

Lady Elizabeth as a Priſoner conueyed to the Court.

(50) The next morning approched, and ſhee in no better plight, notwithſtanding was led forth more like a Priſoner then a Prince, which the people in euery place as ſhee paſſed, did much lament, and ſtrongly guarded, was ſo conueyed vnto the Court, where for foureteene dayes ſpace, ſhee comfortleſſe continued without ſight of friend, the Queene or any Lords, thoſe onely excepted that attended the dores, which were the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir Iohn Gage.

Princeſſe Elizabeth examined of treaſon.

(51) Vpon Friday before Palme Sunday, Gardiner of Wincheſter, and nine more of the Councell, came into her preſence, and there charged her both with Wyats Conſpiracy, and the ſtirres lately made in the Weſt parts, by Sir Peter Carew, and others, which ſhee moſt conſtantly denyed: but in concluſion, they told her it was the Queenes pleaſure, that ſhee ſhould forth-with goe to the Tower, the name of which dolefull priſon, ſtrucke deepe to her heart. I truſt (ſaid ſhee) her Maieſty will be farre more gracious, then to commit to that place a true and moſt innocent woman, that neuer had offended her in thought, word, nor deed. And thereupon inſtantly deſired thoſe Lords to be a meane for her vnto the Queene: which ſome of them promiſed, and much pittied her caſe. But about an houre after, came foure of theſe Lords againe, namely, Wincheſter, the Treaſurer, the Steward, and Suſſex: with a charge to diſcharge her of all attendants, ſauing onely her Gentleman Vſher, three Gentlewomen, and two Groomes of her Chamber, the Guard was ſet to ward in the next roomes; two Lords with bands of men to watch in the Hall, and two hundred Northerne white Coates in the Garden, thus all was made ſure, and ſhee kept from ſtarting.

The honourable parts of the Earle of Suſſex.

(52) The next day came vnto her two Lords of the Councell, with commandement from the Queen to haue her to the Tower, they roundly told her, her Barge was prepared, and that the Tide would tarry for no body: this heauy newes encreaſed this diſtreſſed Ladies penſiueneſſe, who in moſt humble wiſe became Petitioner vnto their Lordſhips, that ſhee might ſtay vntill the next Tide, which as ſhee well hoped, would proue more comfortable; but the one of them being more forward in his Commiſſion then the other, flatly told her, that neither tide nor time ſhould bee delayed. Whereupon her Grace deſired ſhee might write to the Queene: he againe anſwered, that he durſt not ſuffer it, neither in his iudgement was it conuenient: but the other more milder (which was the Earle of Suſſex) kneeling downe, told her, that her Grace ſhould haue liberty to write her minde: ſwearing as he was a true man, himſelfe would deliuer it into the Queenes hand, and bring her the anſwere, whatſoeuer came of it: which honourable permiſſion was then moſt thankfully taken, and afterward moſt highly eſteemed in her Princely fauours towards that honourable man; but in writing this Letter or Petition to the Queene, the Tide was turned, and ſerued not to ſhoote the Bridge with a Barge; therefore it was priuily determined, to take the aduantage of the next, which with better aduiſement was againe deferred, for that it fell about midnight, whence roſe a feare, that ſhee might bee forceably taken from them before ſhee came to the Tower: and ſo with great prouidence was that danger preuented.

Lady Elizabeth carried priſoner vnto the Tower.

(53) The next day being Palme Sunday, ſerued well for their purpoſe, when as vnder pretext of deuotion, the Citizens of London were commanded to carry their Palmes to the Church, whileſt her Barge might be paſſed by without ſight, or any ſuſpect. And to that purpoſe, the foreſaid two Noblemen, about nine of the Clocke repayred vnto her, ſhewing that the time was now come, that her Grace muſt goe to the Tower; to which ſhee anſwered, the Lords will be done, I am contented: ſeeing it is the Queenes minde: and comming into the Garden to take Barge, ſhee caſt her eyes towards euery Window, hoping to ſee ſome that would pitty her caſe, but that alſo failing, ſhee ſighed, and ſaid; I maruell what the Nobility meane, to ſuffer me a Prince to be led into Captiuitie, the Lord knowes whither, for my ſelfe doe not.

The ſeuere and hard dealings againſt the Princeſſe Elizabeth.

(54) Great haſte was made to the Barge, and as much to get by London vnſeene: but the Tyde yong, and not fully come in, the fall of the water at the Bridge was ſo great, as the Bargemen themſelues feared to paſſe thereunder, and motioned a ſtay till the ſtreame were more leuel, which in no wiſe wold be heard: whereupon they paſſed the Arch with ſuch danger, as the ſterne of the boate ſtrucke againſt the ground; and come to the ſtaires, could not take land without ſtepping into the water, which this tender, and newly recouered Princeſſe was forced to doe, in which paſſage ſhe vttered theſe words: I ſpeake before thee, O God, hauing none other friend but thee onely; here landeth as true a ſubiect, being priſoner, as euer landed at theſe ſtaires; to which the ſeuerall Lords anſwered, if it were ſo, it was the better for her. Shee come into the gate, a great number of Seruants and Warders of the Tower ſtood to guard her, through whom as ſhee paſſed, the poore men kneeling down, with one voyce, deſired God to preſerue her Grace, whereof ſome were rebuked, and others put from their Ordinary the next day.

The conſtant patience of Lady Elizabeth.

(55) Then paſſing ſomewhat further, both faint and vncomfortable, ſhee reſted her ſelfe vpon a cold ſtone, to whom M. Bridges, the Lieutenant then being, ſaid; Madam, you were beſt to come out of the raine, for you ſit vnwholſomely; to whom ſhee replyed, Better ſit here, then in a worſe place; for God knoweth, and not I, whether you will bring me: At which her ſorrowfull and dejected anſwer, her Gentleman Vſher, a ſeruant moſt loyall and louing to his Miſtreſſe, among many others brake forth into flouds of teares, the witneſſes commonly of all inward griefe, which he Princeſſe perceiuing, reproued, demanding what he meant, ſo to diſcourage her, ſeeing ſhee tooke him to be her Comforter, and eſpecially knowing her truth to be ſuch, as that no man ſhould haue any cauſe to weepe for her.

The Earle of Suſſex moſt firme for Lady Elizabeth.

(56) Shee ſafely beſtowed, and the dores made faſt with lockes and bolts, was there comfortleſſe left in the dolefull priſon, where calling for her booke, and her few ſeruants about her, ſhee fell vnto prayers, deſiring God to proſper her worke, that ſhe might build vpon the rocke Chriſt: whereby theſe bluſtring tempeſts thus ſuddenly riſen, might not preuaile againſt her foundation. Meane while the Lords were as circumſpect, how ſhee might be kept ſure; many among them propounded, that it was moſt needfull ſhee ſhould be cloſe priſoner, and a ſtrong guard ſet to watch her doore; againſt which the Lord Suſſex replyed, and ſaid: My Lords, let vs take heede wee goe not beyond our Commiſſion, ſhee was our Kings Daughter, and is wee know the Prince next in bloud, therefore let vs ſo deale with her now, that if it ſo happen, wee may anſwer our doings vnto her another day.

Lady Elizabeth commanded to haue Maſſe in her lodgings.

(57) Two dayes ſpent thus in the Tower, and Gods diuine ſeruice celebrated in Engliſh, it was commanded to haue Maſſe in her lodgings; and to that end two of her Yeomen were appointed to anſwer the Prieſt, which was as vnwillingly done, as the deuotion was ſmall. Then were the fauourites examined, yea, and * ſome of them with torture, and all to finde a fit knife to cut her innocent throate, that ſo Wincheſter might waſh his white Rochet in her purple bloud; who being Lord Chancellor, and Ruler of the reſt, came into the Tower to examine her himſelfe, with ſome others of the Queens Councell: Shee then brought before them, was demanded

* Edmund Tremaine.

ded of the talke ſhee had with Sir Iames Croft (a priſoner in the Tower, and then brought to her preſence) concerning her remooving from Aſhridge vnto Dunnington Caſtell: My Lords (ſaid ſhee) mee thinks you doe mee wrong to examine euery mean Priſoner againſt me, if they haue done euill let them anſwere for it, I pray you ioyne mee not with ſuch offenders; as touching my remoue to Dunnington, mine officers, and you Sir Iames Croft can tell; but what is this to the purpoſe, might I not, my Lords, goe to mine owne houſes at all times? whereunto the Lord of Arundell kneeling downe, anſwered that her grace ſaid truth, and that himſelfe was ſorry to ſee her troubled about ſuch vaine matters: well my Lords (ſaid ſhee) you ſift mee narrowly, but you can doe no more then God hath appointed, vnto whom I pray to forgiue you all.

Lady Elizabeth againe examined of Treaſon.

(58) No fault appearing, nor offence found, yet was ſhee ſtill retained in that cloſe and ſorrowfull priſon, and for want of freſh aire, her health began to be empaired; whereupon the Lord Shandoys one of her keepers, obtained that ſhee might walke into the Queens lodgings, the windowes being ſhut onely in preſence of himſelfe, the Lord Chamberlaine, and three of the Queenes Gentlewowen ſent her for the ſame purpoſe; which fauour was further increaſed by liberty to walke into the Garden, the other priſoners commanded not ſo much as to looke into the place while her Grace remained therein.

Liberty obtained to walke in the Garden.

(59) During which time there vſually repaired vnto her a little boy, about foure yeeres of age (a mans ſonne of the Tower) in whoſe pretty pratling ſhee tooke great pleaſure; his vſe was to bring her flowers, and to receiue at her hands ſuch things as commonly pleaſe Children: which laſtly brought a great ſuſpition into the Lord Chamberlaines working head, that by this Child letters were brough betwixt the Princes Elizabeth, and the L. Courtney, whereupon the boy was threatned, and his Father commanded not to ſuffer him any more to reſort to her Grace: which notwithſtanding, the next day hee did, but the dore being ſhut, and hee peeping through a hole, cried vnto her, Miſtreſſe I can bring you no more flowers now.

A child ſuſpected and forbidden to viſite Lady Elizabeth.

(60) It was reported (ſaith Fox) if the relation be true, that a Writte ſubſcribed vnder certain Councellors hands, was directed for the preſent death of the Lady Elizabeth, which hee doth wholy impute vnto Winchesters working: This ſudden charge giuen for her preſent execution, ſore grieued M. Bridges then Lieutenant of the Tower, who forthwith repaired vnto the Queene, to know her further pleaſure therein: but ſhee being altogether ignorant of any ſuch warrant, blamed the doers and gaue a contrary command, whereby was preſerued the life of her ſiſter: which howſoeuer (to the diſtaſture of her enemies) it was prolonged, yet her State of liues ſecurity ſeemed little better, and her feares preſently conceiued, were nothing the leſſe: for the Conſtable diſcharged, Sir Henrie Benifield a more ſeuere Iaylor was placed in his room, who with an hundred Souldiers in blew coates entred vpon his charge: at ſight whereof the fearefull Princes demanded, whether the Scaffold whereon Lady Iane ſuffered was ſtill ſtanding: or whether Sir Henry (a man to her altogether vnknowne) made any conſcience of murther, if hers was committed vnto his charge.

M. Fox. Acts and Mon. 2294.

A Warrant ſigned to execute Lady Elizabeth.

Sir Henry Benifield his ſeueries and Story.

(61) The nineteenth of May her Grace was remoued from the Tower towards Woodſtocke, Sir Henrie Benifield being her conductor, vnto whom Sir Iohn Williams Lord Tame was ioined in Commiſſion. The firſt night ſhee was brought vnto Richmond, where all her owne ſeruants were remoued from her preſence, and the [redacted] Souldiers ſet to attend her perſon; by which ſeuere beginnings, ſhee much doubted that her dayes were neere ſpent, and in that place her life muſt take end: whereupon calling together her ſeruants, deſired them to pray for her; for this night (ſaid ſhee) I thinke I muſt die; which lamentable words drew fountaines of teares out of their eyes; and thereupon her Gentleman Vſher went downe vnto the Lord Tame in the Court, deſiring him vnfainedly to ſhew, whether his Lady and Miſtreſſe that night were in danger of death, whereby himſelfe and fellowes might take ſuch part as God would appoint. Marry God forbid, quoth the Lord Tame, that any ſuch wickedneſſe ſhould bee intended, which rather then it ſhould bee wrought, I and my men will die at her foote.

Lady Elizabeth is remoued to Woodſtocke.

The great feare of Lady Elizabeth.

(62) With no greater comfort proceeded ſhee towards Woodſtocke: Sir Henry her Iaylor (as ſhee termed him) euer carrying ſo hard a hand in his Commiſſion; that the people who with teares preſſed to meet her in the paſſage, and with prayers ſaluted her in moſt louing manner, he both threatned, and draue backe, calling them Traytors and Rebels againſt the Queene and her Lawes; and whereas in certaine villages Bels were rung as ſhee paſſed for ioy (as they conceiued) of her deliuerance, Sir Henry Benifielde tooke the matter ſo diſtaſtfull, that he commanded the bels to ſurceaſe, and ſet the ringers thereof in the ſtockes; ſo that not without cauſe this louing Lady ſent this word vnto her poore ſeruants, and well wiſhing friends, Tanquam onis, as a ſheepe to the ſlaughter, ſo am I led: And ſurely had not the Lord Tame been more comfortable in his place vnto this diſtreſſed Princeſſe, her ſpirit of hopes had been ſpent before the conduction of her perſon had beene accompliſhed.

The ioy that the People conceiued of Lady Elizabeths deliuerance.

(63) Neither in Woodſtocke was her liberty much enlarged, nor feares any leſſe, ſhee being incloſed in none of the beſt lodgings, garded with Souldiers both day and night; and although ſhee had leaue into ſome Gardens, yet were fiue or ſixe lockes betwixt her walke and her lodgings, and all made faſt after her entrance. It was alſo ſuſpected that the Keeper of Woodſtocke, a notorious Ruffian, was inſtigated to kill this innocent Princeſſe, as alſo that one Baſſet a Darling of Biſhop Gardiners, came to Bladenbridge, a mile from Woodſtocke, accompanied with twenty men in priuy Coates, earneſtly deſiring to ſpeake with Lady Elizabeth, pretending ſecret and importunate buſineſſe: but Sir Henry her Keeper gone to the Court, had giuen ſtraight charge to his brother, that none ſhould haue acceſſe vnto her before his returne, though they came from the Councell, or Queene her ſelfe. Whereby that deſigne was happily loſt. What his errand was, I will not determine, but others haue conceiued it was for no good.

Lady Elizabeth in danger to bee murthered.

(64) Another accident alſo hapned, whether of purpoſe, or otherwiſe, I cannot ſay; but ſurely it was to the danger of her life: for on the ſudden her lodgings were on fire, which began to kindle betwixt the boards and ſeeling vnder the Chamber where ſhee lay, and was vehemently miſtruſted to be purpoſely done. Theſe and the like feares daily hapning, drew the diſtreſſed Princeſſe into many paſſions, whereof one is reported, that ſhee ſitting ſolitary at her Priſon window, chanced to ſee a Maide of Woodſtock in the Parke milking of Kine, and as ſhee ſate, merrily to ſing ouer her Pale, which ſtrucke this ſad penſiue Priſoner into a deepe meditation, preferring the Maides fortunes farre aboue her owne, and heartily wiſhed that her ſelfe were a Milke-maide, into ſuch diſtreſſe was her Princely birth brought, in which comfortleſſe thraldome, we will a while leaue her, and returne to ſpeake of matters in the Court.

(65) Queene Mary being now chiefe Pilot her ſelfe, and ſet at the helme of all Soueraigne power, ſteered the ſterne of her zealous affections, according to her owne liking; when preſently vpon her Coronation began a Parliament at Weſtminſter, and a Conuocation in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paules in London, where ſhee commanded a free diſputation for Religion, without any danger of offence.

fence. The questions to bee controuersed, were concerning a Catechisme set forth in King Edwards dayes, and the presence of Christ in the Sacrament of his Supper. For Popish Transubstantiation stood Disputers Doctor Moreman, Doctor Watson, Doctor Chedsey, Master Harpsfield, and Master Morgan, D. Weston Dean of Westminster apointed for Prolocutor: For Christs spirituall presence were M. Haddon. M. Elmar, M. Cheyney, M. Philpot, and Master Perne, these meeting 6 seueral daies disputed only vpon the last question: but with such disagreement, as lastly Q. Marie commanded Boner to dissolue the assembly, without any Subscriptions to the assertions premised.

(66) And not long after Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterburie, Nicolas Ridley Bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer sometimes Bishop of Worcester, were sent from the Tower of London vnto Oxford to dispute vpon the saide Argument against Doctor Tresham, Doctor Cole, Doctor Oglethorpe, Doctor Pie, Master Harpsfield, and Master Pecknam, all Oxford men, vnto whom from Cambridge were ioyned Doctor Yonge, Doctor Glinne, Doctor Seton, Doctor Watson, Doctor Sedgewicke, and Doctor Atkinson, Doctor Weston againe being Prolocutor: the disputation beganne vpon the sixteenth of Aprill, and ended the twentieth of the same moneth, with the sentence of those three Bishoppes deaths, which through fire gaue testimony of their faithes, a yeere and sixe moneths after in the Towne Ditch of Oxford: whose disputations, letters, and last endes, are largely set down by M. Iohn Fox in his Acts and Monuments of the Church, vnto whom I refer the desirous reader, lest by enlarging of them, the course of our temporall story should bee ouermuch interrupted with matters Ecclesiasticall of those sorrowfull times.

(67) Queen Marie intending her marriage with Spaine, great feares were conceiued that many calamities would follow, aswell to the Church, reformed from abuses, as for the politicke proceedings of the Kingdomes affaires; which as some tooke was prognosticated euen from heauen it selfe, by a Raine-bow reuersed, the bow turned downward, & the two ends standing vpward, as also by two Suns shining at one time, and a good distance asunder in the Skies, both which sights appeared in London the fifteenth of February.

M. Fox in Acts & Mon. p. 1637.

(68) In which City a Parliament to that purpose was assembled, wherein by statute the marriage was confirmed, though with no lesse liking of those times obseruers, then was the marriage desired which is fained of the Sunne: to hinder whose purpose, the world is said to haue made suite vnto Iupiter, lest hauing more Sunnes then one, the whole frame of the Globe should bee set on fire. These distastiue stomackes Queene Mary well perceiued, therefore to giue them content, shee wrote her letters into the West, and to Wales, charging the Lord President, the Bishoppes of Oxford and Salisburie, to intimate the benefite thereof to the whole land, as much as might bee, neither was London forgotten, whose Lord Maior and Commons were sent for to the Court, and there by the Lord Chancellor tolde how by this match all the Realme would be enriched, but especially London by their trade and trafficke with Spaine.

In her letters sent them signed with her hand.

(69) Vnto Spaine were sent the Earle of Bedford, and the L. Fitzwaters to conduct K. Philip into England; the Lord Admirall with twenty eight shippes securing the seas the space of three moneths before: all things thus ordered, and Philip in a readines tooke Barke at Corona in Galacia, and with a Nauie of an hundred and fifty saile directed his course for his Queene.

(70) Vpon Friday the twentieth of Iuly, hee arriued at Southampton, and was the first man of that Fleet that set foot on the shore, which no sooner done, but he drew his Sword, and so bare it naked in his hand as he went. The Earle of Arundell L. Steward of the Queenes house, presented to his Highnesse the George and Garter, and the Maior of South hampton the Keyes of the Towne: thither was sent the Lord Chancellor from the Queene, and hee againe sent of his Nobles vnto her, who was on the way vnto Winchester, to welcome him herselfe: towards which City vpon Munday following, hee set forth, being accompanied with the Marquesse of Winchester, the Earles of Arundell, Darby, Worchester, Bedford, Rutland, Pembroke, and Surrey, the Lordes Clinton, Cobham, Willoughby, Darcy, Matreuers, Talbot, Strange, Fitzwaren, and North: besides many Knights and gallant Gentlemen. His Spanish traine were the Dukes of Alua, an Medina Cœli, the Admirall of Castilla, the Marquesses of Burgues, Piscara, Saria, Valli, Aguillar, the Earles of Egmund, Horne, Feria, Chinchon, Oliuares, Saldana, Modica, Euentesalida, Landriano, Castellar, the Bishop of Cuenca, and others: so that more honourable attendants had seldome been seen.

The honourable traines of the two Princes.

(71) And surely the Couenants were as honourable for England that were agreed vpon betwixt them, which were branched into tenne Propositions.

1 First was, that Philip should bee stiled King of England during the Matrimony, and should assist his Queene in gouernement, but not dispose of any Lands, Offices, Benefices, or Reuenewes in the Realme.

Holinsh. p. 1118.

2 That Marie by vertue of this marriage, should bee admitted Queene of the Realmes and Dominions of Spaine already possessed, as of all others, that were appropriated vnto the same, during the Matrimony.

3 That for Dowry shee should receiue yeerely threescore thousand pound Flemish, if in case she ouerliued King Philip her husband.

4 That the Issue proceeding of this marriage either male or female in the right of their mothers inheritance, in the Kingdomes either of England, or other Dominions depending, should succeed in them according to the lawes, statutes, and customes of the same.

5 That if it chanced Charles Duke of Austrich, the Infant of Spaine to die without Issue, then the eldest sonne of this Matrimony should succeed in all the Dukedomes, Earledomes, Dominions and Patrimoniall lands belonging vnto Charles the Emperour, father to the Prince of Spaine aswell in Burgoign as in the low Countries, in the Dukedomes of Brabant, Luxenburgh, Gelderland, Zutphane, Freeseland, in the Countries of Flanders, Artois, Holland, Zeeland, Namure, and the land beyond the Iles.

6 That the Dominions of the low Country, and of Burgundy should be excluded from the Patrimoniall descent of the said Lord Charles, notwithstanding his Issue remained, and should bee enioyed by the eldest borne of this marriage without further claime to any other Dominions belonging vnto Spaine: and the rest of the Children thereof proceeding, to haue conuenient portions and Dowry assined them aswell out of those Countries, as out of England and the others adioined.

7 That if no issue male were borne of this marriage, then the Eldest female should possesse those Dominions, prouided that she shold marry a nobleman, either of the Low Country or of the Realme of England, otherwise the right of the Succession should remaine in the Lord Charles, yet not so cut off, but that shee with the other daughters begot in this marriage, should bee endowed of their fathers Lands and possessions, aswell in Spaine as in the Low Countries.

8 That for want of Issue by the Lord Charles, and of heire male procreated by this marriage, in that case the eldest daughter of K. Philip and Q. Marie should succeed both in the Territories of the Low Countries, as also in the Realmes of England, Spaine, King Philip arriued in England.

Spaine, and the reſt, after the nature, lawes and cuſtomes of the ſame.

9 That who ſo ſucceeded, either hee or ſhee, yet ſhould the ſeuerall Dominions be gouerned by the Natiues borne in the Realmes, wholly and intirely after the priuiledges, rites and accuſtomed manner formerly vſed.

10 That a ſincere fraternity, vnity and peace, ſhould bee confirmed for euer betwixt theſe Nations, ſo as they ſhould mutually aide each other in all things, according to the ſtrength, forme and effect treated of at Weſtminſter, and ſubſcribed vnto at Vtericke.

(72) As theſe were agreed vpon for the Generall, ſo other particulars were articuled with the King himſelfe, which were as followeth.

1 That he ſhould not beſtow the adminiſtration of offices or benefices in the Realme of England, to any ſtranger or perſon not borne vnto the Engliſh ſubiection.

2 That his Court ſhould bee repleniſhed with Gentlemen and Yeomen the Natiues of the Land.

3 That hee ſhould make no inuaſion of ſtate againſt the Lawes and Cuſtomes of the Realme, neither violate the Priuiledges thereto belonging.

4 That hee ſhould not carry the Queene out of her owne Dominions, without her ſpeciall deſire, nor none of her Children without conſent of her Nobility.

5 That if ſhee ſhould die iſſuleſſe, hee ſhould Challenge no right in the Kingdome, but ſhould ſuffer the ſucceſſion to come to her next.

6 That he ſhould not carry or ſuffer to be carried out of the Realme, either Iewels, or other things of eſpeciall eſtimation, but ſhould faithfully keepe them for the profit of the Engliſh Crowne.

7 That hee ſhould not ſuffer any ſhips, gunnes, Ordinance and other munition of warre to bee conueied out of the Realme, but ſhould ſee all the Forts and Frontiers of the Land kept, and the ſame ſufficiently ſtored for their defence.

8 That neither directly nor indirectly, the Realme of England ſhould bee intangled with the warres of his Father, and the French King, neither that himſelfe ſhould giue any cauſe for the breach of peace betwixt the two Realmes.

Philip and Mary married at Winchester. A.D.1554.

(73) Things thus ordered, with conſent of all parties, the marriage with great ſtate was ſolemnized at Wincheſter, vpon Wedneſday being the 25. of Iuly and Saint Iames day, where the Emperours Embaſſadors preſently pronounced, that in conſideration of this marriage, their maſter had giuen vnto his ſonne Philip, the Kingdomes of Naples and Ieruſalem, whereupon their Titles by Garter King at Armes, was ſolemnely proclaimed with theſe ſtiles as followeth.

The large ſtile of King Philip and Queene Mary.

(74) And according to the ſtiles, ſo was the Maieſty of their proceedings, hauing two Swords borne before them as they went from the Church; with other Emperiall Enſines of their great Magnificence; which nothing was leſſened in their paſſage through London; where Engliſh eies beheld Philip, after the affections of their owne hearts, ſome reioicing as Iſrael, that Ieroboams golden calues ſhould be againe erected, and ſome ſorrowing as Iudah, that the Braſen Serpent was not broken, all of them aſſured, that this Salomons ſufferance and his wiues zeale, would build againe the Altars that had been caſt down.

(75) The experience whereof Queene Mary her ſelfe had giuen, euen before ſhee was crowned, in cauſing the Latine Seruice againe to bee ſaid, in diſplacing the reformed Biſhops, and in publiſhing a moſt ſtraight prohibition againſt preaching, and printed Engliſh Bookes: to all which ſome time-ſeruing Church-men gaue their conſents, ſcandalizing not onely the liues of the miniſters, but alſo the ſcriptures tranſlation, and the iuſt proceedings of King Edwards time; againſt all which, Maſter Bourn in a publike Sermon made at Pauls-Croſſe (in the preſence of the Lord Maior and Bonner his Maſter) ſo liberally inueighed, as that one of his Auditors with more diſtaſte then diſcretion, and more zeale then Religion, threw a Dagger at him to his great danger, and no leſſe feare, and ſuch threats murmured againſt him by the people his auditory, as had not Maſter Bradford ſtepped vp in his roome, and perſwaded them vnto quietnes, it had ſurely coſt the preacher his life, which cauſed the Croſſe the next Sabboth to bee guarded by the Queenes Guard, whilſt the Preacher continued in the pulpit.

(76) And againe the like offence was conceiued againſt Doctor Pendleton, who in the next yeere after, and in the ſame place had a gunne deſperatly diſcharged againſt him: vnto ſuch hatred their Doctrine did driue them, and vnto ſuch ſinne the ouerferuent affectioned lay many times expoſed: And no leſſe was that Diabolicall deuice of certaine giddy reformers, who had taught a Maide ſo to ſpeake in a wall, as her hearers beleeued it was the voice of an Angell, being none other, but moſt ſeditious ſpeeches againſt the Queenes proceedings, the Prince of Spaine, the Maſſe, and Confeſſion. In mockage whereof alſo a Cat was hanged on a gallowes neere vnto the Croſſe in Cheape, her head ſhorne, and wearing a veſture faſhioned like vnto a Cope, her fore-feet tyed with a round paper betwixt, like vnto the papiſticall conſecrated bread; and in that manner the eighth of Aprill was ſhewed by the Preacher at Pauls-Croſſe, both to the offence and content of the Spectators; and to deride the ridiculous Idolatries of the time then in vſe, vpon Eaſter day the ſame yeere, and in the ſame Cheape, as the Prieſt of Saint Pancraſſe came to celebrate the reſurrection, and after the accuſtomed manner put his hand into the Sepulchre for the Crucifix (therein purpoſely beſtowed) when he vſed the words of the Euangeliſt very deuoutly: Surrexit non eſt hic, He is riſen and not heere: found it ſo indeed, for that his God was gotten away, and could neuer after be found.

(77) Theſe things (ſaith Fox) cauſed both the Queen, and biſhops, to conceiue an euill opinion of the Londoners; as too much fauouring of King Edwards reformation, for which cauſe Bonner commanded all Scriptures printings vpon their Churches walles, to bee blotted out; and many other iniunctions to be inquired after. But from theſe vain trifles let vs returne to more ſerious matters in the enſuing Hiſtory.

M. Fox Act. & Monuments.

(78) Queen Mary erecting the Maſſe, and leauing the title of Supremacy to the Pope, ſent for her kinſman Cardinall Poole to be her directer in thoſe great buſineſſes, who had been a long time in forraigne parts, and euer a fauorite vnto the See of Rome, whoſe life vntill this time, we will briefly run ouer, ſo many dependances of ſtory relying vpon him.

The life and ſtory of Cardinall Poole.

(79) He was the ſonne of Margaret Counteſſe of Salisburie, the ſecond childe, and only daughter of George Duke of Clarence, ſecond brother vnto King Edward the fourth: whoſe youth was ſpent in litterature at Magdalen Colledge in Oxford; and ſtate increaſed by King Henrie his kinſman, in beſtowing vpon him the Deanry of Exceſter. Then trauelled he into Italy, and at Padua ſtudied ſeuen yeeres, in which time the King hauing aboliſhed the Pope, he was ſent for into England, but refuſing to returne, was was proclaimed Traitor, and his Deanery giuen to another: which his losse was presently repaied by his holy Father, in making him Cardinall, and imploying him in many Ambassages, both to the Emperor and French King, with whom he euer dealt against K. Henry, and solicited others by letters to forsake his friendship and obedience, which his doing brought many into danger, and for which lastly his own mother lost her Head.

Poole made Cardinall.

(78) Then was he made Legate of Viterbion, where he determined to haue led a more quiet life: but Pope Paul the third summoning the obtruded Councell of Trent, appointed Poole with two others to be his Vicegerents: Though indeed this Cardinall was none of the forwardest in the matter of iustification, vnto whose opinion therein he drew one Morrel a learned Spaniard, who of purpose was sent to dispute the Popes Doctrine in that Councell.

(79) But this Holy Father leauing his Chaire empty by death, a faction fell among the Electors, some for the French, and some for the Emperour, which last light vpon Poole, & choose him for Pope. He altogether Imperial, desired a more orderly election supposing himselfe so gracious in the eyes of most that the same would be continued to his greater praise.

Poole elected Pope. Goodwin liues of Bishops.

(80) But the French faction working vpon the aduantage, put the rest in minde of the Emperials sacking of Rome, the imprisonment and iests that were made of the Pope, the absence of many Cardinals Electors, whose voices they knew not, yea and Cardinall Caraffa, alleaged particular exception against Poole the elected, charging him (as Pasquill likewise did) with incontinency of body, as also of Heresie, for arguing vpon a iustifying faith in the Councell of Trent, for frequenting company with Anthonie Flaminius a knowne Protestant, and since he was Legate, that he neuer had punished that doctrine with death.

Poole accused by Cardinall Caraffa.

(81) But these accusations, were rather to shrub off his faire top, that Caraffa himselfe might more eminently be seene, who thought if Poole failed, to be their faircst marke; wherein his politicke expectation was farre ouerseene. For the English Cardinall so cleered himselfe, that the French Caraffa receiued disgrace, and all their voices went for Poole euen the same night, which he againe seemed to dislike of, saying that his election should not be a worke of darkenes, and therefore willed them orderly to proceed vpon the next day; such assurance had his hopes conceiued, that hee thought destiny had been inforced to set the Papall Crowne vpon his Head.

Poole againe chosen Pope.

(82) But whether it were his double delay, or his neglecting to strike when the yron was hot, the Electors change their determination, and choose the Cardinall de Monte for Pope, who named himselfe Iulius the third, and he to congratulate Poole for his Backwardnes, enforced Caraffa to aske him forgiuenes before they departed the Conclaue: Poole thus disapointed of the Papall Chaire, retired himselfe vnto Verona, where in a Monastery of S. Bennets (which order he had assumed and was the Patron) he made his Residence, as desirous to leade a more contemplatiue liue.

(83) But scarcely was he setled before he heard of King Edwards death, and a message sent from Queene Mary (who had been brought vp vnder the Countesse his Mother) for his returne into England. Her affection towards him, he knew was very great both for his person, his learning and religion, and himselfe relied much vpon the old familiarity betwixt them, as also of his birth being of the blood roiall; for which causes he sore longed homeward, not doubting but if things stood as he thought, to get a dispensation, to lay off the Hat, and to put on a Crowne.

Cardinall Poole sent for by Queene Mary.

(84) But the Emperour mistrusting what this Prelate intended, found deuices to hold him beyond Seas, vntill the match was concluded betweene Queene Mary and his sonne. And hitherto Cardinall Poole applauded by the Pope, beganne now to enter into his frowne, for being in England, and Archbishop of Canterbury: his old acuser, the foresaid Caraffa, had in the meane while obtained the Papacy vnder the name of Paul the fourth: when as presently he sent Frier Peto, whom he consecrated Bishop of Sarum, and discharged Poole of his legatiue power, which doings the Queene tooke so ill, that shee forbad Peto to enter the land, vntill a reconciliation was made betwixt the Pope and Cardinall Poole her kinsman. Which man as hath been saide, for soliciting Potent Princes against King Henry, in the quarrell of Rome, had runne in great displeasure with the English, whereby some Acts of Parliament were made against him: all which were now repealed, and Lord Reinold Poole receiued as an Angell of God, vnto whom that honorable house presented a Petition, to bee receiued againe into the bosome of Rome.

A.D. 1553

(85) The suit easily granted, and absolution giuen, all things proceeded at the deuotion of the Romanists. Images were commanded to be erected againe in the Churches: Holy-water, Pax, and Censures, imploied at the Celebration of their Masses and Mattens: Oyle, Creame, and Spittle, vsed in the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptisme. Altars furnished with Pictures, Costly Couerings, & the crucifix thereon solemnly placed: vnto whom Lights, Candles, and Tapers, with great adoration were offered, and all to captiuate the senses of the zealous Beholder, in which zeale Queene Marie her selfe gaue a full testimoniall, in restoring againe all Ecclesiasticall liuings assumed to the Crowne, saying, that shee set more by the saluation of her owne soule, then shee did by tenne Kingdomes. A worthy speech verily, and good example of a Prince, but slowly followed of many meane subiects, who in this case doe rather mussell the mouth of the Oxe, that treadeth out their Corne, then suffer such as serue at the Altar, to liue by the Altar.

The rites of Rome restored in England.

Holinshed p. 11,27.b.

(86) And surely so well inclined was Mary of her selfe, that had not the zeale of her religion, and the authority of Churchmen ouer-swaied her own disposition, the flames of their consuming fires had not mounted so high. But woe to the procurer of those sixe Articles, (for which many had died) enacted by King Henry the eight, whose rigour in some sort himself had both qualified and repealed, which were againe put in practize, especially two, the one of them touching life, and the other losse of goods; which last was the separation of man and wife, the greatest offence to mutuall society, and naturall affection, as can be committed; and that of life so tyrannicall, as the Law it selfe may seeme with Draco's to be writ in blood, and so tirannically followed, that within the compasse of lesse then foure yeeres continuance, there died no lesse, for testimoniall of their conscience in this case, then two hundred seauenty and seauen persons without regard of degree, sexe or age.

Queene Mary commendable in her owne dispositions.

(87) In the heate of whose flames were consumed fiue Bishops, one and twenty Diuines, eight Gentlemen, eighty foure Artificers, one hundred husbandmen seruants and labourers, twenty sixe wiues, twenty widowes, nine Virgins, two boyes, and two Infants, one of them whipped to death by B. Bonner, & the other springing out of his mothers wombe from the stake as shee burned, was by the Sergeants throwne againe into the fire: Which barbarous cruelty, howsoeuer the Author of Englands three conuersions, would excuse, as worthy of death; deprauing the sufferers, of learning, religion; ciuill manners, and honesty of life; yet the more charitable of his own ranke, and profession, doe pitty the spilling of so much Christian blood: the greatest point of no greater sinne, then to beleeue Christs spirituall body, to be spiritually receiued in the blessed Sacrament of his Supper.

(86) The rigour thereof that fell from his mouth, who wished many more had so suffered, when the Sword was so drawne, is farre from the precept and sufferance of Christ, that would haue euen tares grow vnpluckt, till his harueſt were in, and yet if those be his sheepe that follow his voyce, and his word sufficient to make the man of God perfect as himselfe, and Apostle hath taught, then were these excusable by their Aduersaries testimonies, whose Prolocutor in a Conuocation assembled, publikely confessed that these deiected Ministers had the Word, but the Prelates in place the possession of the Sword; which how they then made it drunke with the bloud of Gods Saints, let him that hath the two edged Sword in his mouth, at the great day of triall declare, to whose iudgement and mercy I leaue them.

(87) Sixty foure more were persecuted for their profession and faith, whereof seauen were whipped, sixteene perished in prison, and were buried in dunghils, many lay in captiuity condemned, but were released, and saued by the happy entrance of peaceable Elizabeth; and many fled the Land in those daies of distresse, amongst whom most memorable is that of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke, with her husband Richard Bartie Esquire, whose Story and troubles happened as followeth.

The story of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke.

(88) This Lady Katherine was the onely daughter and sole heire of Lord William, Baron of Willoughby, and of Eresby; and the last wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolke, lately deceased; in whose time how shee affected the Papall Profession, in massing, and maskings, was made knowne by cloathing a dogge in a Rochet, and calling him Gardiner: and againe, in the dayes of King Edward, Gardiner saluting her from his prison window in the Tower, shee told him, it was well with the Lambes now the wolfe was shut vp. These stucke sore vpon the Bishops stomacke, who being now risen to be Lord Chancellour of England, and shee in disgrace with the Queene for her match in marrying Master Barty, a man too inferiour for her high estate, he thought it a fit time and occasion to requite, and to that end sent for Master Barty her husband, charging him to be indebted foure thousand pound to the Queene, which was owing her by his Ladies late Husband, the Duke of Suffolke, vnto whom shee was Executrix, but this was onely the traine of a false fire, and the Dutchesse religion, the marke he aymed at; for whom Master Bartie so wisely wrought, as himselfe was appointed to be her perswader, and so inwardly grew with the Lord Chancellor, that by his meanes he obtained licence to trauell beyond Seas, for a debt owing to his Dutchesse by the Emperour.

The Dutchesse no fauourer of the Popish religion.

The Dutchesse of Suffolke fleeth the Land.

(89) Bartie being gone, and Lady Katherine secretly to follow, vpon the first of Ianuary with foure men, two women, and her young daughter, her selfe apparrelled like a Merchants wife, from Lyon Key in London departed, the morning very mysty, and her heart fraught with feare; for no sooner was she gone, then newes thereof came to the Court, and search made after her, as farre as to Leigh, before her Barke could attaine to the place: where being shrowded by a Merchant, vnder the name of his daughter, shee escaped to Sea; but twice her Ship with contrary windes was driuen to the same Shoare, to her great danger, and no little griefe: yet lastly, shee arriued in Brabant, where shee met with her Husband; whence (being clad like a froe) they came into Cleueland, and at Santon seated themselues, till further prouision could be made.

(90) But the Townesmen suspecting they were not the Persons they went for, and the Bishop of Arras hearing that they were Protestants, purposed with the Magistrate to impeach their liberties, which Barty hearing of, with his Froe and Daughter, attended onely with two seruants, suddenly made a way vnto Wesell, a Towne priuiledged with the Stilliard in London. In trauell they were ouer-taken by night, the weather was rainy, and the thaw vpon a great frost, made the way more deepe, in which distresse, his two seruants he sent to seeke some relefe, whilest himselfe (the surer on foot) bare the childe; and the Dutchesse to ease him bare his Rapier and Cloke.

The great distresse of the Dutchesse.

(91) Thus passing thorow mire, dirt, and darke night, about seuen of the Clocke, all wet and weary, they got vnto Wesell, where he being suspected to be a Launce-knight, and shee his woman no better then naught, could get no entertainement; the language they had not, the childe cryed pittifully, the mother wept bitterly, the cold was extreame, and the raine powred downe, as the clowdes had been broken. In this distresse, the Church-porch was thought vpon to shrowd them from raine, and to that end Master Barty sent his two seruants to buy Coales and straw: but repairing towards this his cold Inne, he met with two boyes that vnderstood Latine, of whom hee demanded for the Ministers House, who presently brought him to the place, where he supped. His name was Pernsell, and had been in England, where, of the Dutchesse hee had receiued kinde curtesie, and now at Wesell imployed his Ministery among certaine Wallons, who hearing that the Dutchesse was fled out of England, and that at Santon shee liued nothing safe, had procured for their abode in Wesell, without making knowne who these English were, saue onely vnto the chiefe Magistrate.

(92) Master Barty desiring to speake with the Minister, hee presently came downe, who seeing the Dutches so disguised in apparell, and bemyred in dirt, could not speake vnto her for teares, and bringing them in with glad hearts no doubt, Master Barty changed apparell with the good man, the Dutchesse with his wife, and their childe, with the childe of the House: and thus were they comforted by this good Preachers meanes.

The Dutchesse sought after to be impeached.

(93) Here they seated not long, but that a sudden watch-word was sent them from Sir Iohn Mason, Queene Maries Ambassador in Netherland, that the Lord Paget had fained an errant to the Spaw, and that the Duke of Brunswicke with ten Ancients, would passe by Wesell for the seruice of Austricke, against the French King, by whom the Dutchesse and her Husband should be intercepted, and deliuered vnto the Lord Paget.

(94) From hence therefore in haste they remoued to the Towne Wincheim in high Germany, which was seated in the Palsgraues Dominions, where by his Protection, they continued till their maintenance began to scant, and they also almost fainting vnder so heauy a burthen, began to faile of all hope. At which very instant (GOD so mouing the hearts of his Princes) the Palatine of Vilua, and the King of Pole hearing of their distresse, sent them a safe conduct, vnder the Palatines seale, with assurance of maintenance, if they would come vnto those parts.

God doth helpe when man doth faile.

(95) From Wincheim therefore they forth-with departed, and in Wagon tooke towards Franckford, but by the Langraues Captaine were intercepted and set vpon in the high way, so that Master Barty was forced to stand at defence, wherein the Captaines Horse was slaine vnder him, and the cry maintained, that he was slaine himselfe, whereupon Barty by the counsell of the Dutchesse, and swiftnesse of his Horse fled amaine, but was so eagerly followed vpon opinion of murther, that hee hardly escaped with life; yet lastly they got into Poland, where they were honourably entertained vntill the death of Queene Mary, whose life in the meane while let vs returne to relate.

(96) The Nouember next following her mariage, the Queene was reported to haue beene conceiued with child, for ioy whereof Te Deum was commanded solemnly to be sung, and Processions and prayers made for her safe deliuerance. The Queene tooke her Chamber, the Court was full of Midwiues, and Gentlewomen attendants, Rockers were prouided, the Cradle prepared, and all made so certaine, that some were punished for making doubt of the contrary. Insomuch that it passed in Parliament, that if God should take away Queene Mary, this their young Master comming into the World, should finde himselfe prouided for; where it was by Act ordained, that King Philip should bee Protector of her Issue, and Gouernour of the Realmes, vntill their Prince or Princesse should come to able yeeres.

So called by Sir Rich. Southwell a Knight of the house. An. 1. & 2. Philip. & Mariæ.

(97) Howbeit as it should seeme this Spanish King had little confidence in the English, for, at his first entrance, he had the Hall dore of his Court continually kept shut, neither any suffered to enter, vnlesse his busines was first made knowne: the Lords hauing leaue to depart London, had strait commandement to send all their Harnesse and Artillery to the Tower; which was done, in regard of the maligners of this marriage: yea, and somewhat doubtfull he was also of those, who in shew bare him a faire face; the rather for that * a Nobleman in consultation, had giuen his counsell to cut off Lady Elizabeths head, assuring himselfe, that those so bad minded to their naturall Princesse, could not bee better vnto him a stranger: who contrariwise vpon this ground so laid the foundation of his true honour, as it gained him loue of all true English hearts: for from that day he neuer left to solicite his Queene for the deliuery of that innocent Princesse her sister, who still remained a solitary Prisoner in Woodstocke, though no proofes could bee brought for any offence.

* Lord Pagat.

K. Philip a great friend vnto Lady Elizabeth.

(98) At last his suit was obtained, and Lady Elizabeth brought vnto Hampton Court, hauing not seene the Queene for two yeeres before, here shee was lockt vp, and laid at by Gardiner to submit her selfe, till some foureteene dayes after, shee was sent for into the Queenes Chamber about ten of the Clocke in the night: which shee no sooner had entred, but falling vpon her knees, shee prayed God to preserue her Soueraigne Maiesty; protesting her loyalty and truth to her Person, whatsoeuer had beene spoken or instigated to the contrary. Vnto whom the Queen somewhat sharpely said; Then you will not confesse your offence, I see; but rather stand stoutly vpon your truth; I pray God your truth may so fall out; If not (quoth the Princesse) I request neither fauour nor pardon at your Maiesties hand: well then, said the Queene, you stand so stifly vpon your owne loyalty, belike you suppose to haue beene wrongfully punished: I must not say so to your Maiesty, said Lady Elizabeth: but you will then so report to others it seemeth, said Queene Mary: no, and it please your Maiesty, said the Lady, I haue borne, and must beare the burthen my selfe, I most humbly beseech your Graces good opinion of me, and to thinke me your true Subiect, which from the beginning hitherto I haue euer beene, and will bee for euer so long as my life lasteth. The Queene replying in Spanish, said; God knoweth: and so they departed; King Philip as is thought, standing behind the Arras, heard what was said.

Lady Elizabeth brought in presence of the Queene.

The conference of the Queene and Lady Elizabeth.

(99) Some seuen dayes after, her Grace was discharged of Benefield her Iaylor, and had leaue of liberty, yet so, that Sir Thomas Pope, a Priuy Counsellor, and M. Gage the Queenes Gentleman Vsher, were still her Attendants all Queene Maries time: her Gentlewoman Mistresse Ashley was sent to the Fleete, and three other waiting Maides vnto the Tower; but the death of Gardiner immediately following, these stormes grew more calmer, and Lady Elizabeth euery day more affectionately respected.

Lady Elizabeth discharged of imprisonment.

(100) About this time, William Constable, alias Fetherston, a Millers sonne in the North, bruted himselfe to be King Edward the sixt, but was seconded by none of any esteeme, and therefore the lesse dangerous or likely to be beleeued. Notwithstanding all diligent search was laid for the Counterfeit; and hee lastly taken at Eltham in Kent, from whence to Hampton Court he was presently conueyed, where his answers were so simple, that he was esteemed as a franticke, and sent to the Marshal Sea for a Lunaticke foole: and from thence in a Cart this counterfeit King (whose Crowne was a paper inscribed with his fault) was brought vnto Westminster, and from thence whipped to Smithfield, whence he was banished into the North, and without further punishment was so released: But this Fetherston the next yeere (as a dogge returning to his vomit) gaue it forth that King Edward was aliue, whereupon he was againe apprehended, condemned of Treason, and hanged at Tyborne.

(101) Now the expected time of Queene Maries deliuerance being fully approached, a rumor ranne in London and elsewhere, that a Prince was borne; for ioy whereof the Bels were rung, the Bone-fires flamed, Processions made, and some in their Sermons described the beauty of that goodly Boy, and great Prince. At Antwerpe also the like triumphs were made by the English Merchants, the Marriners shooting off their Ordinance; for which an hundred Pistolets were sent them from the Lady Regent: but these flying reports proued but wind, which turned the Vane shortly into another point; for the truth bursting forth, told for a certaine, that the Queene had neuer been conceiued, neither indeed was euer like to be: which raised as many doubts, as had been tales of her deliuerance: some affirming, that shee was with Child, but miscarried; some, that shee was deceiued by a Tympany: and some that this rumor was spread for a policy: but what the truth was, saith Grafton, I referre vnto others that know more.

(102) King Philip thus frustrate of his hope for his Heire, vpon the fourth of September went ouer the Seas to visite his Father the Emperour, and to take possession of the Low-Countries, where hee stayed one yeere and six moneths, to the great griefe of Queene Mary his wife, whom as some thought he little affected, and this his long stay made the suspition no lesse. But now returning to Douer, he was by his Queene met on the way, and brought through London, accompanied with many Peeres of the Realme, as in triumph against a Coronation.

(103) In whose absence many conspiracies had beene intended, but their foggy smoakes were vtterly extinguished before the fire could burst into flame: for certaine persons plotting to robbe the Queenes Exchequer at Westminster, meant with the money to raise warre in the Land; the Leaders into this attempt were Henry Peckham, Iohn Daniel, Richard Vdall, Iohn Throgmorton, Iohn Dethicke, William Stanton, William Rossey, Iohn Beadell and White, the reuealer of the same intendments. These all excepting White, were at sundry times executed, and Sir Anthony Kingston apprehended for the same, died on the way vnto London.

(104) The like stirres were attempted by one Cleber a Schoolemaster, sometime at Dys in Norfolke, who in the Parish Church of Yarle, among a great assembly at the celebration of a marriage, stood vp, and read a penned, but trayterous Proclamation against the Queene, perswading the people to take Armes, and to free the Land of wrongs done by strangers.

Conspiracies in Norfolke.

(105) So likewise Thomas Stafford, second sonne to the Lord Stafford, with other Conspirators against the King and Queene, fearing the iust punishments for their deserts, had fled the Land into parts beyond the Seas; from whence attempting still to broach their Rebellions, they sent certaine Bookes and letters written and printed, full of most slanderous vntruthes: and now following King Philip into Eng[illegible] assisted by some English and strangers, tooke by stea[illegible] the Castle of Skarborough in Yorkeshire, where he p[illegible]blished a most shamefull Proclamation mation against the Queene, trayterously affirming that shee was neither rightful, nor worthy of raigne, and that the King had giuen vnto his Spaniards the greatest and strongest holds of the Land. But by the prowesse of Thomas Pearsey (presently created Earle of Northumberland) he was surprised, sent to London, and there made shorter by the head All these stirres quieted, new troubles were rather sought for, then ministred, and more losse followed to Englands dishonour, then glory had beene gained by this Spanish great Match.

Thomas Stafford beheaded.

(106) For the Emperour ouer-worne with the affaires of the world, and wearied with the troubles of turmoyling warres, or rather touched with remorse of conscience, for the infinite miseries brought by him vpon Florence, Naples, Sicilie, Tuscane, Elbe, and Calabria, being perswaded that these mournefull iarres of Christian Princes, had giuen to the Turke aduantage vpon diuers parts of Europe, he called his Sonne King Philip of England, vnto Bruxels (as is said) where, by authenticke letters bearing date the fiue and twentieth of October, hee resigned all his Realmes vnto him, commanding all his Estates and Subiects to acknowledge and hold him their lawfull King; and among many other instructions and most wise exhortations, gaue him charge chiefly to hold amity with the French, lest otherwise the warres of those Puissant Nations might oppresse all Christendome.

Charles the Emperour resigneth all his Dominions to his sonne King Philip.

(107) King Philip indeed was much inclined to peace, and Queene Mary his wife at that time much more, both to hold him with her at home, and to support the Religion which shee had raised, by restoring the Clergy their wonted possessions, whereof much was then held in the Noblemens hands, from whose hard hold, hardly could any thing be wrested; but those in her owne, shee freely resigned by Parliament, with this most Christian resolution, and Princely saying: that shee set more by the saluation of her owne Soule, then shee did by the reuenewes of ten Kingdomes, and so committed the restauration and disposse thereof vnto the Pope, and Cardinall Poole his Legate, to the great wealth of the Church, and impouerishing of the Crowne.

(108) King Philip following his Fathers aduice, made peace with France to continue for fiue yeeres, which no sooner was made, then was againe broken, but most of all to the losse of the English: for the Kings did not loue, though their weapons were laid downe, and ancient hatred bred daily new discontents: one principall was ministred by Pope Paul the fourth, then an enemy vnto the Spaniard, whom Duke Alua had mued vp within the walles of Rome: His hope of helpe was in Henry the French King, vnto whom hee sent a triumphant Harte, with a stately Sword, and thereupon had succour by the Guise, who by force made his way open into Rome: But the French decreasing for want of pay, and the Spaniard still raising their Trophees of victory, the Pope thought it surest to hold with the strongest, and so made frustrate his amity with the French.

(109) Queene Mary of England, now the Pope was for Spaine, and Philip her husband preparing for France, to shew her great loue and obedience to both, rather sought an occasion against King Henry, then any ministred by him for the breach of peace. Her pretenses were many, as that the French King had instigated one Dudley and Ashton, vnto a new conspiracy, which they consulted vpon in his Ambassadors House in London, and being reuealed, fled into France, where they were maintained by an annuall pension. The like shee alleaged against King Henry for succouring of Stafford, and his rebellious complices, for suffering his Pyrats to molest her Seas, and for want of more, renewed the remembrances of Northumberland and Wyats rebellions, who as was alleaged, were supported by him.

Iohn Stow Annals.

(110) These things premised, a defiance was sent into France, and was pronounced vnto Henry at Rhemes by Clarenceaux King at Armes. The French King loth to heare of these warres, made his answer and preparations accordingly: and Queene Mary contrary to promise, entangling her Subiects with the quarrels of the Spaniards, with sound of Trumpet in London proclaimed warres against France. To prosecute which, King Philip her husband passed ouer to Callis, and thence into Flanders, where he made prouision to enter the field: after whom the Queene sent a thousand Horsemen, foure thousand Footmen, and two thousand Pioners, and the Earle of Pembrooke was appointed Captaine Generall, vnder whom in seuerall places serued Vicount * Montacute, the Lord Grey of Wilton, the Earle of * Rutland, the Earle of * Lincolne, the Earle of Bedford, the Earle of * Leicester, and the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords Howard, De la Ware, Windsor, Bray, Shandoys, and Dudley, with many other Knights of approued valiancy.

(111) These passing the Seas, ioyned with King Philip, whilest the Dukes of Sauoy and Brunswicke, the Earles of Egmond, Horne, and Mansfield, had inuaded the French confines, and planted a strong siege before Saint Quintins; to whose rescue Monsieur Mountmorancy Constable of France, came with nine hundred men at Armes, as many light Horsemen, seauen hundred Roisters, twenty two Ensignes of Lancequenets, and sixteen Ensignes of the French: and thus furnished, he meant to put more Souldiers into the Towne, but in the assay so miscarried, that himselfe was both hurt and taken prisoner with eight Noblemen more, all of them Knights of the Order, and not many dayes after, King Philip with his English came to the siege, by whose manly prowesse Saint Quintins was taken, for ioy whereof great triumphs were made in England, which long lasted not, through the losse of Callis.

S. Quintins taken by the English.
August 20.

(112) For this great victory made the English both negligent and careless, so that the Towne of Callis, and the Forts thereabout for defence, were vnrespectiuely regarded, and besides the neglect of supply to those peeces, the Souldiers thinking all out of danger, stood gazing at the shadow till the substance was lost: for the French being netled, that S. Quintins was Philips, let slippe no occasion wherein was aduantage: and the Duke of Guize imploying the Constables place, determined to put to proofe an enterprize for Callis, which long and many times had been purposed vpon.

The English negligent after Saint Quintins was wonne.

(113) This danger fore-seene, intelligence thereof was sent into England, but no supply heard of, first the Master of the Ordinance posted to the Councell, and secondly followed the Captaine of the Castell himselfe, but either by wilful negligence or lacke of credite with the Queene and Councell, those businesses in France were slenderly regarded, vntill the supply was altogether too late. For the Duke of Guize with a maruellous celerity approached the English Frontier, vnder a colour to victuall Boloigne and Ard, and vpon a little sorry plat of ground, intrenched at Sandgate, and thence diuiding his Army into two parts, sent the one vnto Ricebancke, whilest the other laid battery to two Forts at once, both which hee wanne within the space of twelue houres, the Captaine and Souldiers secretly departing to Callis. The like successe had the French against Ricebanke, being abandoned by the English Souldiers, and left to the Guize, and his disposse.

(114) Then were Canons mounted against Callis it selfe, and with continuall battery for three dayes together, a breach made in the wall, not farre from the Water-gate, but yet vnassaultable, the English within so maintained the defence: this then a traine of false fire (for the French neuer meant their accesse that way) whilest all attended to make good the breach, the Duke had planted fifteene double Canons against the Castell, which once perceiued, the Callizians knowing their resistance too weake, sto-Callis surrendered to the French.

(117) The Lord Wentworth then Deputy of the Towne, seeing all in like danger if meanes were delayed, sent vnto the Castle to haue a Parlee for composition, which the French forth-with accepted, and sent out two Gentlemen for pledges, whilest Iohn Heisield Master of the Ordinance, and Edward Hall Constable of the Castle, concluded vpon these dishonourable Articles, as followeth:

Vnhonourable Articles.

1 That the Towne, the great Artillery, Victuals and Munition should bee yeelded freely to the French.

2 That the liues of all the Inhabitants should be saued, and haue their safe conduct to depart.

3 That the Lord Deputy, with fifty others whom the Duke would appoint, should remaine prisoners, and be put to their ransome.

The hard vsage of the English.

(116) Things thus ordered, the English were commanded into the Churches of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas, where they remained that whole day, the night following, and vntill the next day in the afternoone, without either meate or drinke, in which time the Duke of Guize commanded by Proclamation, that all Iewels, Plate and Money, to the value of a groate should be laid vpon the Altar, and that vpon paine of death, a sorrowfull offertory towards the English, and a great enrichment vnto the French. Then was the Towne voided of fiue hundred ordinary Souldiers (a small Garrison indeed to man such a place) of Townesmen, women and Children, foure thousand two hundred; the Lord Wentworth, Deputy, Sir Raph Chamberlaine Captaine of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander Captaine of Newnambridge, Edward Grimston, Iohn Rogers, and others, to the number of fifty were sent prisoners into France, vntill ransome were paid: And thus the Towne and Forts that were wonne by the victorious King Edward the third, and that by no lesse then eleuen moneths siege, hauing now beene possessed by the English the space of two hundred and eleuen yeeres, was in the compasse of eight dayes besieged, surprized and wonne in the depth of Winter to the Worlds wonder, and great suspition of treachery, which happened the seuenteenth day of Ianuary, and in the same moneth were surrendred the strong Forts of Guizes, and Hames, whereby all the English footing was lost in the Continent of France.

Edward the eleuenth from William the Conquerour, wanne it: and Mary the eleuenth from Edward, lost it.

(117) This winning of Callis and the other strong holds, as they were ioyous to the French, and with Te Deum & Bonefires celebrated with no lesse solemnity, then was that for the recouery of the County Oye, and the Fort won from the English in An. 1347. so was it grieuous vnto the English Nobility, and most of all vnto Queene Mary her selfe. Insomuch as shee ceased not to trauell with the King and Councell how to couer the dishonour of her Raigne, by this losse of Callis; and albeit some assayes were made against Breest, and Mounsieur Thermes the new Captaine of Callis taken prisoner by County Egmont Generall for King Philip in the Low-Countries, yet the maine was neglected, and could not be recouered for any composition, which strucke so deepe a melancholy into Queene Maries minde, as shee letted not to say, that the losse of Callis was written in her heart, and might therein be read when her body should be opened. In which passions shee continued the rest of her Raigne, which neuer had beene very prosperous, nor greatly pleasurable vnto her selfe, after shee had abolished the Gospel, restored the Popes Supremacy, and married a stranger, who was vnto her a stranger indeed.

Queene Maries sayings for the losse of Callis.

(118) Of all since the Conquest her Raigne was the shortest, onely excepting that of Richard the Tyrant, but much more bloudy then was his, and more bloud spilt in that short time of her Raigne, then had been shed for case of Christianity, in any Kings time since Lucius the first establisher of the Gospell in this Realme. Her conceptions failing, extreame dearths raging, hurt done by thunders from heauen, and by fire in the royall Nauy, forraigne losses, Callis surrendered, and King Philips keeping from Court, daily augmented Queene Maries melancholy, which lastly increasing to a burning feauer, made an end of her life, at her Mannor of *S. The Bible presented to Queen Elizabeth.

The religious care of Queene Elizabeth.

(4) The fifteenth of Ianuary (being Sunday) the Coronation was solemnely performed, and the Imperiall Crowne set on her head by Doctor Owen Oglethorpe Bishoppe of Carlile, the Archiepiscopall See of Banterburie being vacant euer since her entrance, by the death of Cardinall Poole, who died the same day that Queene Mary did.

Her Coronation.

Cardinall Poole and Q. Mary. died both in one day.

(5) Presently there followed a Parliament, wherin the Title of Supremacie was againe restored to the Crowne, with the first fruites, and Tenths of all Ecclesiasticall liuings, and the Booke of Common prayer ratified for an vniforme celebration of Gods diuine seruice in the English Churches; as also those Acts repealed that were enacted by Queene Mary, in fauour of the Romish Religion. Things thus established, and liberty giuen to the Gospell; many that had fled the Realm in case of conscience, returned, and were prouided for according to their worthes, and that Gods Truth might be established, (which thing her princely heart chiefly sought after) a conference was commanded and begunne at Westminster the last of March, concerning certain Articles to be discussed amongst the Diuines. The Propositions were three,

Conference at Westminster. touching Religiō

1 It is against the word of God, and customes of the ancient Church, to vse a tongue vnknowne to the people, in common Prayer, and the Administration of the Sacraments.

2 Euery Church hath authority to appoint, take away, and change Ceremonies, and Ecclesiasticall rites, so the same be to edification.

3 It cannot be proued by the word of God, that there is in the Masse offered vp a sacrifice propritiatory for the quicke and the dead.

The Propositiōs to bee discussed. Ioh. Stow. p. 1084.

The Impugners of these Assertions were,
- Iohn White B. of Wincheber,
- Ralfe Bayne B. of Lichfield,
- Cuthbert Scote B. of Chester,
- Owen Oglethrope B. of Carlile,

- M. Iewells.

These being solemnly set with many Honourable Counsellors among them, before the Conference could well beginne, it was finally ended, and all through the default of the Bishops (as Stow hath alleadged) who, first pleaded a mistaking of their directions, and in the next sitting, vtterly refused either to write their owne, or to read the others reasons, whereby all was vndone that was intended, and whereof a part was * imprinted, as is yet to bee seene.

The Conference ended almost as soone as begun.

(6) During the time of this Parliament a Petition was made vnto her Maiesty for the hope of royal Issue, to moue her vnto marriage; vnto which eloquent Oration deliuered by the Speaker, shee re- "plyed with great thankes for their louing care for "her, and their owne Country: but as touching "their requeste, shee answered, that from the time, "when first shee considered her selfe to bee borne a "seruitor of God, shee happily did choose, and in "truth best liked a Virgins life, from which, neither "Ambition of high marriages, which had been for- "merly offered her by her Prince, nor the grieuan- "ces sustained by her, whiles shee liued among "those enemies, whose indignation was death, had "hitherto been able to diuert her: but whether "her yeeres and answere could concord together "in their iudicious minds; shee certainely knew not; "yet this shee assured them, that as then shee stood "so affected, and if that affection changed, her choise "should bee onely of such a one, as should bee as "carefull, shee would not say, as her selfe, (because "shee knew herselfe best) but as any of them for the "Realmes good, and yet withall shee considered, "that although her selfe, for their welfare (if neede "were) would not shunne death, yet might her "Issue (as often happeneth to the best parents) grow "out of kind, and proue vngracious. And there- "fore to leaue behind her a more lasting and grate- "full remembrance; shee held it sufficient, that a "Marble-stone should declare to posterities, that she "a Queene had raigned, liued, and dyed a Virgin: and so with many thankes dismissed the assembly. How the first was accomplished, wee that liued vnder her raigne haue seene; but how insufficient that one stone is to containe, & continuate the remembrance of her vertuous, pious, and glorious gouernment, the whole world doth at this day, and shal to all succeeding ages witnesse, whilest the Earth rests in the Center, and the Heauens haue restlesse mouings.

In the meane while a peace being on foot betwixt the Kings of France and Spaine, Queene Elizabeth also interposed for England, wherein the restoring of Callis was a maine point, whereupon her Highnesse stood, which was thus.

(8) The Earle of Arundell, the Bishoppe of Ely, and Doctor Wotton Deane of Canterburie remained Commissioners in France at the death of Queen Mary, vpon composition for the regaining of Callis, & other peeces lost in the cause of K. Philip: her Maiesty sent them instructions to continue their demands, and certain sure grounds wheron they might worke. The first was that the quarrell of warre was not Englands, but Philips of Spaine, in whose fauour Queene Mary his wife against the will of her Councell, sent him aide of her Subiects. French Proofes that Callis was Englands.

French ſhould challenge Callis as inhereditary vnto the Crowne of France, to that they ſhould anſwere, that there were many Signiories and places in France, whereunto the Engliſh might make their iuſt claime, and ſome in poſſeſſion ſince Callis was Engliſh, which Towne was not onely Lawfully granted, and aſſured from the French themſelues vnto the Crowne of England, but was alſo allowed by Articles of all treatiſes of peace, for the ſpace of two hundred yeeres and more, this euermore ſpecially prouided, that Callis ſhould remaine in the quiet poſſeſſion of the Engliſh.

Great ſummes of Money owed by France.

And the better to impreſſe the deliuery of Callis, in the mould of the French, they were to demand certain arrerages, wherin their King and Realm had fallen for great ſummes of monies and debts accruing to the Engliſh Crowne: aſwell by the acknowledgement of the mother of King Francis then being Regent of France, and iudgement thereupon giuen; as alſo by the treaty of More, de dato, 1525. The treaty of perpetuall peace, de Dato, 1527. and the late treaty betweene King Henry the eight, and King Francis, for the deliuery of Bullein, de dato, 1546. by all which appeareth, that there was two Millions of Crownes due, and very little thereof yet paid, the copies of which treatiſes and confeſſion, the ſaid Commiſſioners haue with them. Alſo another debt of an hundred thouſand crownes, as appeareth by a Bill of King Francis hand. And where alſo there is one perpetuall penſion of fifty thouſand crownes due, as appeareth by the treaty of perpetuall peace, and one other penſion of Salt, as appeareth by the ſame treaty. All which notwithſtanding, rather then the French ſhould retaine Callis, her Maieſty was contented to remit the whole debt and arrerages: but without that in no wiſe ſhee held it conuenient to conclude peace with France, and that obtained, ſhee remitted the other Articles to the diſcretion of the Commiſſioners. But the Engliſh Queene was no more deſirous to haue Callis, then the French King vnwilling to let it goe. Whereupon laſtly, it was thus concluded, That Callis ſhould remaine French, the tearme of eight yeeres, and thoſe expired, ſhould returne to the Engliſh vpon forfaiture of fiue hundred thouſand crownes; the branch of which agreement, from the Latine, and that from the originall, is thus tranſlated.

(9) It is couenanted, agreed, and concluded, that the ſaid moſt noble Lady Queene of England, ſhall ſuffer and permit the foreſaid moſt Chriſtian King of France, his heires and ſucceſſors, to hold, poſſeſſe, and peaceably enioy, from the day of the date of this preſent treaty, vntill the terme of eight yeeres following, the Towne of Callis, with the appertinances and appendices belonging to the ſame; and alſo the Port or Hauen of the ſaid Towne, with the Tower of Ruysbanke, and alſo the Towers, Lordſhips, Villages, and places of Newnainbridge, Merke, Oye, Hams, Sandgate, the Tower and Towne of Guiſnes, and all the reſt of that County taken in this laſt warre, and all other Townes, Caſtles, Villages, Lands, Dominions, Territories, Waters, Riuers, Hauens, Defences, Forts and Shores, and generally all places whatſoeuer ſcituate vnto them by the ſea, which the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King hath gotten in this laſt warre, and taken by force of Armes, in the raigne of the moſt noble Lady Mary, late Queene of England. And the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, hath promiſed, and doth promiſe aſwell in his owne name, as in the name of the King Daulphin his ſonne, his heires, and ſucceſſors, for which Daulphin, the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King hath made himſelfe, and doth make himſelfe anſwerable, promiſing that hee will take care of, and effect that the ſaid King Daulphin ſhall approue this treaty, and ratifie it, within two moneths after the date of this treaty, which ſaid terme of eight yeeres being complete and ended, the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall preſently without delay, relinquiſh, deliuer, and reſtore, or cauſe to bee deliuered, and reſtored to the ſaid moſt noble Prince Elizabeth, Queene of England, her heires, and ſucceſſors, or to thoſe that ſhould bee thereunto deputed by her, or her heires and ſucceſſors, the ſaid towne of Callis, with the appertainances and appendices aforeſaid, and all other and ſingular places aforeſaid, and alſo the Towers, Caſtles, and fortreſſes whatſoeuer in the aforeſaid parts, and alſo the places now of late builded, fortified, or reedified during the ſaid terme of eight yeeres; and the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall leaue the poſſeſſion of all the ſaid places, and depart from it, and wholly forſake the ſame. So that the moſt noble Ladie Queene Elizabeth, her heires and ſucceſſors may peaceably enioy, and quietly hold the poſſeſſion of them with all the rights, priuiledges, preeminences, ſuperiorities, recognitions, and all other authorities in the like manner, ſtate, condition and nature, in which the Kings of England haue held them, and poſſeſſed them before the beginning of this laſt warre. Prouided notwithſtanding, and expreſly couenanted, that the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall not be bound to reſtore or deliuer the Townes and Fortreſſes, and places aforeſaid, otherwiſe then in the ſame ſtate, manner, and condition, in which now at this preſent they are, and hereafter ſhall bee ſtrengthened and fortified by them, during the ſaid terme, yet ſo notwithſtanding as neither in the time of ſuch reſtitution nor before, that there be not any thing done of ſet purpoſe, whereby the former ſtate of the ſtrengthes, and fortifications which now it is in, or which heereafter added, by them, bee in any wiſe miniſhed, broken, or ouerthrowne, but that all things without fraude, bee reſtored intire and vnimpaired, in manner aforeſaid.

Alſo it is couenanted and agreed, that during the terme of the ſaid eight yeeres, it ſhall neither bee lawfull for the ſaid Chriſtian King, nor for the ſaid moſt fortunate King and Queene of Scots; nor for the ſaid moſt happy Queene of England to innouate, attempt, or enterpriſe by warre any thing againſt each other, or for any one of them againſt the other, or againſt the Kingdomes, proper dominions, and Subiects of each other, either directly or indirectly, to the preiudice of this preſent treatiſe, &c. And likewiſe if any thing ſhall be ſo innouated and attempted by the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, and moſt happy King and Queen of Scots, or the ſubiects of them, by the authority, commandement, and approbation of them, or any of them. Then the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, and King Daulphin, their heires and ſucceſſors, by ſuch kinde of innouation attempted, vpon the deed done, ſhall bee bound and obliged to leaue and depart from the poſſeſſion and occupation of the ſaid Towne of Callis, and of all other places aforeſaid on this ſide the ſea, taken of late from the Engliſh, by the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King. And all thoſe things they ſhall deliuer and reſtore without any delay to the ſaid moſt worthy Queene of England, in the ſame maner and forme, in which at the ſaid terme of eight yeeres, they were promiſed and couenanted to be reſtored: which reſtitution if it ſhall not be ſo made, the ſaid Merchants and pledges ſhall be bound to pay the ſaid penalty of fiue hundred thouſand Crowns to the ſaid moſt worthy Queen of England, and the couenant notwithſtanding of reſtoring the ſaid Towne ſhall neuertheleſſe remaine in force. Moreouer if any of the Subiects of any of the Princes aforeſaid, of their owne authority, ſhall endeauour or attempt any thing againſt the ſubiects of either of the ſaid Princes in preiudice of this Treatiſe, hee ſhall be puniſhed as an infringer of the peace, according to the quality of the fact.

Theſe couenants notwithſtanding they were ſealed and ſworne vnto, yet were neuer performed at the yeeres of expiration, though Marchants were bound, and hoſtages aſſigned to remaine in England till the money were paid.

(9) So ſuſpiciouſly had this Towne of Callis been recouered from the Engliſh, that the L. Wentworth (the Deputy) was indited in Queene Maries daies, and now arraigned at Weſtminſter; the Marqueſſe of Northampton being his Iudge, and Lord Chiefe Steward of England for that day; but that Nobleman ſo nobly defended himſelfe, that he was acquitted by his Peeres, and wan a moſt honourable opinion for his many and faithfull ſeruices.

(10) Her Highneſſe hauing thus cleered the Engliſh

English are from all Papall infection, and eſtabliſhed Peace, the greateſt benefit for the Subiect; on the foureteenth of May, being Whitſunday, Diuine Seruice began to be celebrated in the Engliſh tongue, whereby Gods Trumpet might bee heard in a perfect ſound, and the praiers of the Congregation vttered with an vnderſtanding heart. To the end therefore that the Clergy, the Teachers of others, ſhould not be infected themſelues, the Oath of Supremacy, with other Articles, was offered vnto them, the refuſers wherof were forthwith depriued, and others ſurrogated that were more loyally affected. In place of Poole deceaſed, Doctor Parker was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Cantarburie, and of Yorke, Doctor Younge in ſtead of Heth, who refuſed the Oath; and ſo of ſome others: then went forth Commiſſioners to ſuppreſſe thoſe Monaſteries reſtored by Queene Mary, and to caſt out thoſe Images ſet vp in Churches, whoſe ſight hauing heated the blinde zeale of many poore ignorant people in places of Oratory, were now themſelues in the ſtreets conſumed in the fire, at whoſe flames might be ſaid, as in Iſaiah touching peeces of like ſtuffe, had been ſaid: I am warme I haue been at the fire.

(11) After the reducing of this purer worſhip into Gods Church, the next care the Good Queene tooke, was to enrich her Realme, by reducing her Coynes into fine and pure Sterling, and debaſing of Copper monies: cauſing likewiſe great ſtore of Munition, Armour and Powder to be brought into the Land, and laid vp in a readines as occaſion ſhould ſerue, that nothing might be wanting either for the wealth or ſafety of the ſubiect.

(12) But theſe her bleſſed beginnings in England were little as it ſeemeth to the liking of the French King, Whoſe hope (ſaith Leſlie) by certaine acts of Parliament made by Q. Mary againſt her ſiſter the Lady Elizabeth to debarre her from the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, was to eſtabliſh Queene Mary of Scotland, who had lately married Prince Dolphine his Sonne, laying her title from Margaret the eldeſt daughter of King Henry the ſeuenth, linked in Marriage with Iames the fourth King of that name, ſhee being the daughter of King Iames the fifth his ſonne. And therefore as the neereſt in blood and lawfull heire to the Crowne of England, he cauſed by Proclamation in Paris her Stile to bee publiſhed vnder the name of Mary Queene of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and cauſed the Armes of England to bee ioined with Scotland and France, which the Dolphine and ſhee did impale, both in their Seales, Plate, Tapiſtry, and other adornements; which cauſed great troubles (ſaith hee) betwixt the Kingdomes of England, France, and Scotland.

(13) In Scotland Religion (as England had embraced it) beganne to be practiſed; Preachers ſpake boldly, and bookes were dayly brought thither, which nothing at all commended the Pope, and by them (ſaith the Biſhop) the people were moued to a ſedition, which to preuent, the * Queene Regent cauſed an aſſembly of the Biſhops and Barons, vnto whom the Miniſters preſented theſe Articles.

3 That ſuch perſons enioying the profits, ſhould perforwe their duties and preach the word to the people.

4 That none ſhould be admitted in time to come, into the Miniſtery, vnleſſe his life and learning were anſwerable to that excellent calling.

The Scotiſh Biſhops anſwers.

(14) To the two firſt, the Biſhops alleaging the cuſtomes of the Romane Church, would in no wiſe conſent, leauing euery man at liberty priuately to pray in what language he beſt liked; and the election of their Biſhops to the preſcription of the Canon Law, and to the appointment of their Queene. For the two latter, they affirmed, no better order could be preſcribed then that of their Common Law, which impoſeth vpon them, aſmuch as was required; and thereupon they began to put the ſame in execution, commanding all that had charge of ſoules to fit themſelues to their functions, otherwiſe to looke for no fauour from depriuation, after the terme of ſixe moneths. Which was (ſaith the ſame Author) the principall cauſe, that a great number of young Abbots, Priors, Deacons, and beneficed men, did aſſiſt the enterprize, and practiſed deuices for the ouerthrow of the Catholike Religion.

Many Scotiſh Abbots, Priors, &c. aduance true Religion.

(15) True it is, that at the preaching of Iohn Knoxe, and other Miniſters affecting reformation, not onely the Images, Altars, and other like things of abuſe, were caſt downe and burnt, but alſo the Charterhouſe of the Friers at Perth deſtroied, which was the faireſt Abbey in the Realme of Scotland, then followed the ouerthrow of the Monaſteries of Saint Andrewes, of Stone, of Striueling, and of Linlithaw; which ouer-heady proceedings cauſed ſuch ſtirres in the Land, that the Lords of the Combination encamped at Cowper, to abide battle againſt the French (who came into Scotland to impeach their purpoſes) had not the trauels of ſome Noblemen preuailed on either part.

Stirres in Scotland railed by ſome heady proceedings.

(16) The French King, thus ouer-buſie about Scotlands ſtate, was ouercareleſſe of his own, when (at ſolemnizing the marriages of his daughter and ſiſter) he would needs be a Challenger at Tilt, ſeconded by the Duke of Guize & Ferrara, which triumphant ioy was ſuddenly clowded with a ſad Cataſtrophe. For to runne his laſt (and indeed his laſt) courſe in fauour of his Queene, hee ſent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery, with a command to haue him enter the Tilt; but hee excuſing himſelfe from running againſt his Maieſty, alleaged, that fortune the day before, afforded him not to breake one ſtaffe, and that now (as he feared) ſhe would put him to a ſecond ſhame; but the King, deſtiny ſo enforcing, and his date fully runne, ſent him a ſecond command, which Montgomery very vnwillingly obeyed, and breaking his Lance vpon the Kings Cuiraſſe, a ſplinter thereof, his beauer being ſomewhat open, ſtrucke him ſo deepe in the eye, that thereupon ſhortly hee ended his life.

(17) After whoſe death, Francis his ſonne, and ſecond of that name, at the age of ſixteene yeeres ſucceeded him in the Crowne of France; hauing by the marriage of Queene Mary, the Title of Scotland annexed to his others. He hearing of the troubles raiſed there, in caſe of Religion, ſent Mounſieur de la Broche to ſtrengthen the Field, and the Biſhop of Ameans to aſſiſt the Queene Regent, with his farre reaching and inſeeing councell. Surely the preparation to withſtand them was great, & the Combinators many that ſtood for Reformation, as namely, one Duke, fourteene Earles, and eleuen Lords, beſides other of name and account; but knowing their Aduerſaries forces, and ſeeing thoſe ſtrangers to poſſeſſe diuers of their Townes and Forts, to the oppreſſing of the Kingdome vnder forraigne ſubiection, they were enforced to become Petitioners vnto Queene Elizabeth, for aide to expell the French, who ſought the ſubuerſion of the Realmes ſtate.

(18) The Magnanimious Queene, nothing fearing the threats of that potent Nation, nor liking ſuch neighbors as formerly profeſſed to rob her of her right, and now vnder pretence of ſuppreſſing the Scots, were not vnlikely to attempt an inuaſion vpon her Realme; (for ſo the Almanes, hired by the French, were told they ſhould doe) gaue them aſſiſtance vpon Articles aſſured; whereof one was, that they ſhould hold faithfull concurrence with England during the life of the French King, and one yeere after. For the performance whereof, fiue young Gentlemen were ſent into England; and the Duke of Norfolke into the North, who from Barwicke diſpatched the Lord Gray of Wilton for Generall into Scotland, accompanied with many worthy Captaines, ſixe thouſand foot, and one thouſand two hundred and fifty horſemen; theſe comming to Salt-Preſton, were

But the French (the meane while) vnder the command of Monſieur Doiſell iſſued forth of Leith, and in good array tooke the field, which when the Lord Gray perceiued, hee ſent an Harold vnto them, willing them to depart till the Engliſh were returned, according to the order betwixt their Regent and him; but they returned him anſwer, they were on their Miſtreſſes ground, which they meant to make good, and thereupon diſcharged a whole volley of ſhot vpon the Engliſh Army.

(20) The Allarum thus giuen when leaſt it was expected, a cruell skirmiſh began, wherein dyed of the French about ſeauenſcore perſons, the reſt were enforced backe into Leith, and many of the Engliſh both hurt and ſlaine. Whereupon they intrenched the Crag, and planted their Ordinance againſt Leith, vpon whoſe Steeples the French had mounted their great Canons, whence their Bullets flew amaine; and ere long a bold attempt was vndertaken by them, who with fifty Horſemen, and fiue hundred Harquebuſiers iſſued out of Leith, and aſſayled the Engliſh new trenches with ſuch valour, as they entred, and a while poſſeſſed the ſame; where they tooke Maurice Barkeley priſoner, won his Enſigne, cloyed the touch-holes of three great Peeces, and ſlew no ſmall numbers of their reſiſters.

(21) The Engliſh by this time had armed themſelues (for this aſſault was vnexpectedly giuen) and Captaine Vaughan with his, brauely entred the Trench, who being ſeconded by Captaine Sommerſet, Reade, and Arthur Grey, recouered the ſame with ſome ſlaughter of men, the Ordinance from Leith diſcharging vpon them, to the great annoyance of their honourable ſeruice; and now being Maſters of what was late loſt, they cleared the great Ordinance which the French had ſtopped, and caſt a new Trench along by the old Chappell, whence with their great Peeces they beate downe the Steeples of Saint Anthony and Saint Nicholas in Leith, and diſmounted the Peeces that therein lay leuelled againſt them.

(22) In the full courſe of which diſſentions, the Queene Mother, Regent of Scotland, (a Lady of excellent endowments of minde) conſumed with thoughts, diſpleaſures, and melancholy, departed this life in Edenborough Caſtell: the Lords waxing ſtronger, and Leith much weaker through extremity of famine, and the French King, (the onely pillar on whom their ſtrength did conſiſt) not able to aſſiſt them. Who being brought daily into feares, through new tumults ariſing, and increaſed in his own Countrey of Amboyſe, was forced (ſaith Leſlie) to yeeld vp all the Dominions, both of France, and of Scotland, vnto Pope Pius the fourth, to be at his command and defence; but his Holineſſe fearing his owne tottering eſtate, like a wiſe man, that meant to warpe no more then hee could well weaue, ſuffered King Francis to ſeeke for other redreſſe, which he did from her, that was more willing and better able to giue him content.

(23) For ſending his Ambaſſadors vnto Queene Elizabeth, whoſe noble ſpirit himſelfe had firſt prouoked, deſired her peace to be had with Scotland, and that Commiſſioners might be appointed to meete with his in that Realme; alleaging that it was vnfitting to a Soueraigne to ſue to his Subiects, as hee was ouer them by his marriage with their onely Queene. Her Princely mind euer forward to aſſiſt the afflicted, and now deſirous to ſaue Chriſtian bloud, diſpatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecill her Principall Secretary, with Doctor Wotton Deane of Canterbury, one of her ſacred Councell, eminent for his ſingular prudence, and formerly imployed vpon like affaires in France.

Commiſſioners of England and France meete in Scotland.

(24) Theſe falling in conference, concluded finally vpon certaine Articles, whereof thoſe that concerned England, were theſe: That neither the King of France, nor his Queene of Scotland, ſhould thence-forth vſe the Armes or Titles of England, or Ireland, and that all Letters ſealed with thoſe Armes ſhould be called in within ſixe moneths ſpace; that both the Engliſh and French ſhould depart Scotland, ſome few excepted, employed vpon occaſions, and that a generall pardon ſhould be enacted by Parliament, concerning all ſuch as had been in theſe ſtirres. Which Parliament was aſſembled at Edenborough in Auguſt following. Theſe things accompliſhed, an Ambaſſage of thankes was ſolemnly addreſſed vnto Queene Elizabeth by the Earles of Morton, Glencarne, and the young Laird of Lethington, with proffer that the Earle of Arran, the greateſt Lord in account among them, ſhould bee at her diſpoſe for marriage, which (as they well hoped) would be to her ſelfe.

Articles of Accord.

An Ambaſſage of thanks to Queen Elizabeth.

(25) With the like conceiued hope the yeere before, John Duke of Finland, ſecond ſonne to Guſtabus King of Sweden, was ſent to her by his Father, to treate a marriage for his elder brother Ericus, who was moſt honourably entertained, but diſmiſſed without all hope of his ſuite. Notwithſtanding, Guſtabus being dead, Ericus now raigning King of Sweden, hauing impriſoned his brother John, ſolicited her Maieſty the ſecond time, but to his diſhonour as it fell out, for his ſuite reiected in the Engliſh Court, he attempted to match with the youngeſt daughter of Philip Lantgraue of Haſſia, who hearing that he had twice receiued deniall in England, denied him alſo with ſome diſgrace, giuing his daughter vnto Adolfe Duke of Holſt, Vncle vnto Frederick King of Denmarke, at that time enemy to Ericus.

(26) The Peace ſcarcely was concluded betwixt England and France, when Francis the young King was taken away by death, and another pupill King crowned, euen Charles his younger brother, and ninth of that name, who was guided altogether by the Regency of the Queene Mother, and moleſted with the ciuill diſſentions betwixt the Princes of Guize and Conde. For whoſe reconciliation Queene Elizabeth ſent Sir Henry Sidney, Lord Preſident of Wales; vnto which her endeauours, howſoeuer the French gaue countenance in Court, yet on the Seas they tooke her Merchants ſhips, impriſoned the men, and ſeized their goods, no other cauſe alleaged but that they were Hugonets.

(27) Theſe miſdemeanors, Englands great Queen tooke not well; yet did ſhee not ſo much blame, as pitty the young and ouer-ruled King, brought to ſuch a ſtraight, that he was neither able to defend the authority of his owne Lawes, nor to vphold the leagues made with other Princes. But moſt eſpecially the cauſe of Religion (the onely pretended motiue of all theſe diſturbances) together with the ſolicitations of the French themſelues (as from Roan, Deip and Newhauen) moued her Maieſty firſt to ſet forth her grieuances publikely in print, and next to ſend aide vnto Monſieur Vidame, Captaine of Newhauen, againſt ſuch as ſought to ſubuert both Religion and the Eſtate.

Ambroſe Dudley Earle of Warwick Generall of the Engliſh.

(29) The Generall of theſe Engliſh ſo ſent, was the Lord Ambroſe Dudley, Earle of Warwicke, who following his charge before gone to Seas, arriued at Newhauen the nine and twenty of October, where his Commiſſion was proclaimed, and oath taken, vnto whom ſtrengths of Scotiſh men were ſent him from Diepe, whereof Monſieur Montgomery was preſently made Gouernour, hauing loſt Roan vnto the King of Nauarre; though the vnfortunate King bought the victory with his owne death, as he viewed the weaker parts of the City.

(30) To with-ſtand the Engliſh thus ſetled in Normandy, the Coute Reingrane was ſent, and in familiar conference told the Earle of Warwicke, that hee was come to be his neighbour; but proued indeed ſo couetous an encrocher, as laſtly hee diſpoſſeſſed the Earle of the Towne. For albeit that many manly feates were therein performed by the Engliſh, and the place ſtored with prizals of wines; yet wanting freſh victuall, but eſpecially freſh water, which the enemy had cut off, the calamities were great, and much more augmented by a contagious peſtilence, that ſlew many more then did either famin or ſword; ſo that the Engliſh hauing poſſeſt the Towne for eleuen moneths ſpace, now were conſtrained to ſurrender it vpon compoſition, bringing thence many ſicke Souldiers that dangerouſly infected England with a long continuing plague.

(31) Times motion in England now moued onely with the benefit of peace, and no act memorable to commit vnto Hiſtory; let vs ſupply this Interim with looking a little into the ſtate of Religion in France; as wee haue ſeene, and ſomewhat touched the proceedings thereof both in England and Scotland. The Goſpell ſpreading farre in that faire Continent, the impugners tooke occaſions to raiſe many ſtirres, and all in ſhew to race out new hereſies, as they accuſed and called the reformed doctrine. For which cauſe the French Townes burning in the flames of ſeditions, the Proteſtants bloud was thought fitteſt to quench them, and the rapines committed vpon chaſte wiues and Virgins, was pretended to bee canceld by a marriage wrought and contracted betwixt two Princes of the bloud: which were Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Nauarre, a fauourer of the Goſpell, and Margaret of Valois the third Daughter of King Henry the ſecond, and Siſter vnto King Charles now raigning, a Princeſſe much deuoted to the Romiſh Religion. (32) This match was plotted by the Marſhall of Coſſe, and the Maſter of Requeſts, with the deuice no doubt of ſome in higher place, who wrought the Queene of Nauarre, vnder the pretence of great affection, that the French King bare vnto her; and the Chaſtillon Admirall (a moſt zealous Proteſtant) vnder an intent of imployment for the defence of the Low Countries, againſt the King of Spaine. This match indeed ſeemed to confirme a publike concord, onely the Popes diſpenſation muſt be had, by reaſon of pretended conſanguinity of the parties, the one being petty Nephew, the other Grand-child of Francis the firſt King of France. And the Queene of Nauarre made ſome ſcruple of the Ceremonies for the celebration, place, and Church; but ciuill reaſon ouerſwaying all difficulties, the Theater muſt be Paris, as the Capitall City, and the marriage acted without any change of Ceremony, or of royall forme.

(33) Chaſtillon the Admirall was formoſt at Court, where the Papals gaue him place, and to take from him all iealouſie or miſtruſt, the King countenanced him ſo much, that hee repayed his loſſes ſuſtained in the warre, grants him the reuenewes of his brother the Cardinall Chaſtillon, that lately fled and dyed in England, treates with him familiarly, giues him a place in his Priuy Councell, and euer honours him with the plauſible name of Father; inſomuch as the people began to murmure that King Charles not onely fauoured the Hugonites, but was now become a Hugonite himſelfe. And the Admirall for his part thinking all vpright, to that end moueth the King to treat a peace with the Queene of England, to the preiudice of the Spaniards: with theſe motiues among others; that Elizabeth was vnmarried, and Henry Duke of Anion had no wife, the dignity of ſo high an alliance was honourable for the Duke, and the quality of a Kings brother was not to be contemned by the Queene; he hauing in his young yeeres purchaſed great honour and reputation.

(34) The charge of this meſſage was committed to Marſhall Mountmorency, both to haue his abſence at Court, the better to worke what was intended, and to ſtay her Maieſty by vertue of that peace, from attempting any thing againſt France, in fauour of the Proteſtants. The Foord thus founded by the well-meaning Admirall, ſeemed the more ſafely paſſable: for the two Queenes of England and Nauarre; the firſt of them granting the Peace ſo deſired, and the other without all iealouſie repayred to the French Court; where eighteene dayes after her arriuall, of a quotidian Feuer ſhee dyed, though others ſaid, not without ſuſpition of poyſon, by the perfume of a paire of Gloues preſented vnto her.

(35) Soone after, the marriage was ſolemnized vpon a high Scaffold, built before the Church dore of Our Lady in Paris; and foure dayes ſpent in Playes, Feaſts, Dancing, and Maskes: all which were but traines and introductions vnto what was intended: for the Admirall departing the Kings preſence with all complements of amity, as hee paſſed from the Louure, and in reading a Petition, was with a Harquebuſſe leuelled out of a window, ſhot into the left arme, and dangerouſly hurt. At which traiterous attempt, the King and Queene mother ſeemed to be greatly perplexed, viſiting him with all expedition, and for his further ſafety, commanded all his fauourers (the Proteſtants) to be lodged neere about him. But the night now approached, Coſſeines brake into his Baſe-Court, and three of his Company entring his Bed-chamber, with their weapons barbarouſly murthered him, whoſe goared body at Guizes command, they caſt out of the Window, Guize himſelfe wiping the bloud from his face, acknowledged him to be the man. His head they cut off, and preſented to the Queene-mother, and ſhee balming it, ſent it to her Holy Father for an aſſurance of the death of his moſt capitall enemy.

And with the like helliſh fury the bloudy faction, oppreſſed the Proteſtants, both in the City and Suburbes, ſparing neither ſexe, condition, nor age, through whoſe ſtreets nothing was heard but ghaſtly horrour, armes, horſes, and death, with the pittifull ſhrikings of the Innocents, crying (but alaſſe in vain) for mercy. On the other ſide, the ſhoutes of the murtherers preuailed, ſaying, that this one day ſhold end the quarrell, which neither Pen, paper, decrees of Iuſtice, nor open warre for twelue yeeres together could euer doe. Lamentable was the ſpectacle of thoſe ſacred and maſſacred carkaſes ſtrewed in the ſtreetes, the pauements, Market-places, and Riuers dyed with their bloud, and that Sabboth made direfull, and to the Papiſts infamous, with the bloudy pollution of ten thouſand Innocents, in the ſtaine whereof we will leaue them, and returne our ſtile againe for England.

ment; a man cruell by nature, and claiming an inheritary right of the Prouince of Vlster, as the O-Neales formerly had done of all Ireland. For in the troublesome times of Robert Brus, when his brother Edward named himselfe King of Ireland, Douenald O-Neale, rowsed out of his lurking holes, in his missiue letters vnto the Pope, styleth himselfe King of Vlster, and in right of inheritance, the vndoubted Heire of all Ireland. But his glorious shew being clowded before it was seene, his posterity puld in their hornes like snailes, vntill the fire-brands of Ciuill dissentions betwixt the Houses of Lancaster and Yorke gaue light to their footing, whilest the English left Vlster vnto their custody, and followed in England the faction which they best fauoured.

(38) At which time, Henry O-Neale began to be great by marrying the Daughter of Thomas, Earle of Kildare; as afterward also his sonne * Con-More O-Neale, marryed the Daughter of Girald Kildare (his Mothers brother) both of those Kildares being Deputies of Ireland. From the bed of these Cosen-germanes, issued Con O-Neale, surnamed Bacco, because he halted; who was so right Irish, that he cursed all his posterity, in case they either learned the English language, sowed wheate, or built them Houses, lest the first should breed conuersation, the second Commerce of sustenance, and with the last they should speed as the Crow, that buildeth her nest to bee beaten out by the Hawke.

(29) But King Henry the eight, with whom was no dallying, setting his tallant fast on Kildare, in whose rebellions O-Neale had engaged himselfe deepe, so ouer-dares this enuying Irish bird, that he flyes into England, sues to the Eagle, renounceth the name of O-Neale, and puts his whole estate into the Kings hand. Whose humble submission so satisfied his crowned bird, that his life was deliuered out of his claw, and letters Pattents granted vnder the Great Seale of England, to hold his reuenewes in Fee of the King, together with the Title of Earle of Tir-Oen, to him and to Mathew his false reputed son, and to the heires of their bodies lawfully begotten, at what time the said Mathew was created Baron of Dungannon.

(40) Shan O-Neale, (with whom we began) the eldest legitimate vnto this Con-Bacco, seeing himselfe disherited, and a bastard preferred before him, suddenly set his heart against his Father, as also against Mathew his high honoured and halfe-reputed brother, whom hee neuer left till hee had murthered, and pursued his Father with such irreconcileable hatred, as he stript him out of House and all, and neuer left, till for want and griefe, the olde man pined away.

Shan O Neales cause of rebellion.

(41) Shan then chosen, proclaimed, and inaugured O-Neale, by an old shooe cast ouer his head, seized vpon his Fathers inheritance, and with all diligence sought after the sonnes of Mathew, to secure himselfe of that which he had got. Brian the eldest he caused to be slaine by Mac Donnel Totan, one of the Oneals race, but Hugh and Cormack by meanes of the English escaped his hands. Thus seated in Vlster, hee began to tyrannize ouer the great men of that Prouince, accounting them his Subiects, as in his answers vnto the English Iusticiar, expostulating with him vpon that point, he laid his Title.

(42) That he was the vndoubted sonne and heire of Con-Oneale, borne of his lawfull wife, and that Mathew his supposed brother, was the sonne of a Blacksmith, borne in Dundalke, and vnto the age of fifteene yeeres had beene so reputed and taken; that then he was obtruded vpon Con; by the said Smiths wife, whom hee had formerly kept for his Concubine, with an intent to interuert the inheritance and honour of the O-Neale another way. That his surrender vnto King Henry of England, was of no validity, considering that Con had no longer therein then his owne life, neither could that lawfully be done without the consent of the Nobles of Vlster, by whom he had beene elected O-Neale. That himselfe was by Law both of God and man, the onely true Heire, being the first begotten sonne of his Father, lawfully borne in Wedlocke, chosen, declared and proclaimed O-Neale, by the generall consent of the Peeres and People of Vlster, and that according to the ancient Law Tanistry, whereby a man at his full yeeres is to be preferred before a boy, and an Vncle before a Nephew, whose Grandfather suruiued the Father; and lastly, that he had done nothing, but what he had sufficient authority to doe, and which his ancestors had not vsed before him to doe.

(43) His title thus pleaded and passed without opposition, hee presently fell into other out-rages; for O-Raylie hee ouerthrew in the Field, tooke Cailoigh O-Donel Lord of Tir-Conel captiue, cast him and his children in prison, carried away his wife, and in adultery begat bastards vpon her, seizing vpon lands and goods at his pleasure, and bare himselfe as absolute King of Vlster.

Shan O-Neales out-rages.

(44) These his doings Thomas Earle of Sussex (the Lord Deputy) sought to redresse, whose preparations so strangely terrified him, that by the counsell of Girald Earle of Kildare, he came into England, and cast himselfe prostrate at Queene Elizabeths feet, and vpon his submissiue behauiour and promised allegeance, with her gracious fauour returned home; where for a while in his diet and apparell, he conformed himselfe to all kind of ciuility, yea, and did some office of seruice in driuing the Scots out of Vlster, slaying their Leader Mac Conel, and in protecting the poorer sort from the violence and oppressions of the Nobles. In which his doings he drew vpon himselfe their hatreds and complaints; and he whose nature could disgest neither, fell furious for reuenge vpon Mac-Guir, Lord of Fermanagh, fired Armagh, the Metropolitane City, laid siege vnto Dundalke, and harried the Countrey on euery side.

(45) Against whom Sir Henry Sidney, then Deputy of Ireland, came in person himselfe into the Field: and Edward Randolph, a renowned Coronell, with seuen Ensignes of Foot, and a Cornet of Horsemen, encamped at Derry by Logh Foil, that so hee might charge the backe of the Rebell; which O-Neale well perceiuing, hasted with his forces to remoue: where Randolph in a pitcht field entred battell, and there manfully fighting with honour, lost his life, but gaue the O-Neale so great an ouerthrow, as neuer after he was able to make Head against his Soueraign, and in many other Skirmishes was so foyled, as he euidently saw his owne dreadfull downfall. Wherefore hee minded once more to sue for the Queenes mercy, and with a halter about his necke, intended to humble himselfe to the Lord Deputy, for his fauour and mediation vnto her Maiesty.

For the surer gaining of whose fauour, he sent before hand Surley-boy, Alexanders brother, whom he had taken and retained prisoner a long time, and soon after, himselfe with the wife of O-Donel (whom adulterously he kept) repairing vnto them, was kindly welcommed & intertained in a Tent; where after their Cups, they fell to a brawle about Iames Mac Conell, (Alexanders brother) whom Shan had slain, as also about the honesty of his sister, whom he had married and cast off, for the loue he bare vnto O-Donels wife. Callis demanded of the French King. April 28.1567.

(47) The time now expired for retention of Callis so sore thirsted after, and so thirstingly kept; Queene Elizabeth presently sent vnto Charles the French King, to demand the deliuery according to couenants. He set in estate, accompanied with the Queene mother and others, the English Ambassadors had audience, and the Title controuersed among them as followeth. The Queenes Letters read, and attendance giuen what would more be said: Sir Thomas Smith (for he was the man) demanded in her Maiesties name, the Towne of Callis, the Forts, and other the appurtenances, the Castle and Towne of Guize, and generally all such Castles, Townes, and places as had been taken by his Father Henry, the late French King in his last warres, from Mary late Queene of England, her Maiesties sister: which in a Treaty of peace made at Casteau in Cambrensis the yeere of Christ 1559. was agreed vpon, that his Soueraigne, Queene Elizabeth, should permit the said French King and his successors to possesse, and peaceably to enioy the said Townes, Castles, and places, the space of eight yeeres, and those expired, the said King Henry couenanted for himselfe and successors, to deliuer the same intirely vnto the English, which being compleat and ended, the second of that present moneth Aprill, himselfe with Sir Henry Norris her Maiesties Ambassadors, vpon the third day of the same moneth, demanded in her name the possession thereof accordingly, but could not attaine, or get speech, either with Lieutenant or Gouernour. Whereupon they were inforced to make repaire to his Maiesty, whom he doubted not but would accomplish the performance, and likewise keepe perpetuall amity with his Soueraigne Lady and Mistresse.

The Towns Gouernours would not be spoken with.

(48) King Charles but young, and altogether gouerned by the Queene-mother, hauing well learned his lesson, made present answer, That Callis was his, and that none had right thereunto but himselfe, neither should any deliuer it to any other, and that the Treaty, named by the English Ambassador, did wholly giue it him. Whereunto Sir Thomas replyed, That neither her Maiesty nor Counsell did so take it, nor indeed could, the words of the Treaty being so plaine, and manifest. Why, Master Smith, quoth the Queene-mother, I marueil the Queene your Mistresse would now send for such a purpose, and especially you, who knoweth none better, how all things haue passed: you know that your Queene hath forfeited Callis, and all her rights in those places diuers wayes. As first, by inuading the Kings Subiects in Scotland, then most manifestly at New-hauen, where the King, my Sonne, was faine with an whole Army to recouer it; and in the said Treaty was an Article as hath been disputed, that if the Queene of England should inuade any part of my Sonnes Dominions, shee should forth-with lose her right in Callis.

King Charles speech to the Ambassadors.

Obiections against the Queen of England.

(49) Madam, said Sir Thomas: King Henry and his successors were bound to lose Callis, if they inuaded England, and yet did King Francis, brother to the King here, doe it by the way of Scotland, as is most manifest, after the said Treaty at Casteau, not onely in assuming the Armes and Title of England and Ireland, but contrary to the Articles of Peace, which concluded that both English and French should depart Scotland: which incontinently her Maiesty performed, in reuoking thence her Lieutenant, Captaines, and Souldiers: whereas contrariwise Monsieur D'oisell their Chieftaine abode therein still, and the French power daily augmented vnder the conduct of Monsieur de Martigues, and de-la-Brosse, and also by another great Commander, whose Nauy was dispersed by tempest, and whose strength his shipwracke did testifie, in Holland, Zeland, Norway, and Denmarke, by the losse of Armour, Men, and Munition: to let passe * Britaigne and Normandy, then in preparing to inuade England; and Lantzknights likewise hired in Saxony, and the Land of Lunenburge to assist the French in that enterprise, when these Almanes according to their nature loath to take Seas, and desirous to know whither their seruice intended, were told, they should no further then Scotland, and to the Land adioyning, which was plentifull of gold, siluer, and all kind of wealth, and where no Almane Souldier had made spoile for the space of an hundred yeeres before, and to some of them in plaine termes it was told, that they should into England; which was likewise signified vnto her Maiesty, both from her neighbour Princes, warning her Highnesse to take good heed vnto her selfe, as also by letters intercepted, that declared their intents; whereof shee did not onely admonish Mounsieur de Seure then Ambassador in England for France; but also by her Ambassador to the French King, praying him to desist from such attempts so preiudiciall to her Highnesse, and so directly against the treaty of Peace. To colour which matter, the said de Seure made a Protestation in Print, the answer whereunto is likewise printed in English, French, Italian, and Latine, wherein may appeare the History of that time. And since her Maiesty hath had a more manifest proofe by men which are yet aliue. For when the most part of the French power was arriued in Scotland, the Queene Mother Monsieur de Oisell, and Monsieur de Martigues, called the Scotish Lords with their Forces vnto Aimouth, besides Barwicke; where they declared, that their minde was to inuade England; and to giue to the King & Queen the possession of the English Crown; of which they now had the Titles and Armories. But the Lords of Scotland vpon consultation, made answer, That they had often attempted to inuade England, but they neuer got any good thereby; further affirming, it was against the peace newly concluded and sworne: so neere was it to execution. Vpon this there followed a treaty of peace at Edenborough, wherein the number of French Souldiers were to be lessened; the Stile and Armes of England left downe, and the treaty of Casteau renewed and confirmed: all which may appeare by the hands of them which were Commissioners, authorized by the French King vnder his Great Seale: which treaty when it was signed with all the Commissioners hands, the Queene my Soueraigne for the loue of peace, being contented to seale and sweare; the said King Francis did refuse them both, sith which refusal her Maiesty doth, and hath alwayes taken that the right of Callis, both propriety and possession, was deuolued vnto her by reason of the attempt, and hath demanded it diuers times, yet was content to stay the time of composition; which now being clearely expired, it must needes be hers, and cannot iustly be denied.

Answers to the French obiections.

(50) Why (said the Queene) all this while you haue said nothing against the King my Sonne, why hee should forfeit it; he hath done nothing: and is the bearing of your Armes so great a matter with you? you beare the Armes and stile of Ours, and so doe many beare others Armes also. No Madam, said Sir Thomas Smith, the bearing of the Armes is not so great a matter, but that with other things doe declare the intent, and the attempt maketh the right forfeited by the treaty. And though the King your sonne did not forfeit it, yet the right being once lost from France, and accrewed to the Queen of England, how should it goe from her again? All this while (said the Queene Mother) you speake but of the King of Scotland, who did it in his wiues right, and there you must aske your amends, and not here; you here what my Son saith, and euery man seeth the right is his, your Queene hath forfeited it, and therefore I marueil my good sister will stand in it, or send to demand it. This is the answer, said Sir Thomas, which I shall carry to the Queene my Soueraigne. That? Nay, said the King, I will talke with my Councell, and then shall you haue a resolute answer. Then were the English Ambassadors desired to absent themselues a while, and within an houre after were sent for againe.

* An Addition taken out of a former Treatise written by Sir Thomas Smith.

The cause for Callis debated before the French King and his Councell.

(51) The King ſet in Councell with the Queene Mother, the Dukes of Anion, Alanſon, Monpencier, Aumale, and Neuers, the Cardinals of Bourbon and Chaſtillon, the Biſhops of Orleance and Lymoges, Monſieur de Valence & others, the Ambaſſadors of England were placed in the middeſt: vnto whom the Queene ſpake and ſaid, Monſieur L' Ambaſſador, I pray you ſay your minde before the King and his Councell here aſſembled: which Sir Thomas Smith preſently did in the ſame forme as hee had done before, adding with all, that this demand was grounded vpon the lapſe of the time, by which without all controuerſie after eight yeeres Callis was due to the Queene of England, and that by right, both the propriety, and the poſſeſſion thereof was inueſted vnto her long age, by the forfeiture made by the attempt in Scotland, by the commandement and conſent of Francis the ſecond to inuade England, ſeeing the King did not ratifie the treaty made at Edenborough.

Callis fortified by Couenant.

(51) Monſieur de Valence ſaid the Queene Mother, I pray you anſwer that, whereupon he ſtanding vp ſaide, my ſelfe was ſent to that treaty of peace, and am glad to heare Monſieur L' Ambaſſador confeſſe that the bearing of the Engliſh Armories was but a ſmall matter, and yet was that the chiefeſt thing imputed by their ſide, as for the men of warre, they were not aboue fiue thouſand at the moſt, ſent indeed becauſe of a rebellion (for ſo muſt I tearme it in plaine tearmes) then riſen there. But the Engliſh men were aboue fifteen thouſand that came againſt them at Petty-Lith. There was ſent thither alſo the Biſhoppe of Amiens with the Popes Bulles to reduce them againe to the Religion Romane. And as touching theſe matters I ſpake with your Queene as can through England, and offered her as much at the firſt as was done in that Treaty, if ſhee would breake the League betwixt her and the Scotiſh Lords, which were Rebels. But ſhee ſaid ſhee could not. Now for the ratification and confirmation of that Treaty which was ſigned with my hand and others: there ſhould haue come into France certaine Scotiſh Lords to haue agreed and ſworn to certain Articles, which did deferre to come till the King was ſore ſicke, and could not attend them, who ſhortly after died and ſo the Treaty was not ratified. And hee being dead, the King that now is, had nothing to doe to ratifie it: for the matters therein touched Scotland, and their Queens doings and titles, which appertained nothing at all vnto him.

Monſieur d'Valence.

The Romane religion a chiefe cauſe of theſe ſtirres.

Sir Tho. Smith.

(53) To whom Sir Thomas replied and ſaid, I am not ignorant that the Article ſaith, Armis innouare, attentareaut moliri, and doe not take Armis to ſignifie Armories. But the Armes that I meant to weigh the moſt, and the attempt with them done was the Armed men, and the good Captaines whom I named D'Oiſel, Broſſe, Martigues, and others, their Enſignes and Companies, marry the Armories and Titles did diſcloſe the intent and meaning. And if there had beene none other but them which the Biſhop brought, and none other munition but the Popes Bulles; Queene Elizabeth ſhould not haue needed to haue armed ſo many Shippes, nor ſent ſo many Souldiers to haue let their enterpriſe, nor would euer haue complained of it: but it was far otherwiſe as I haue declared. As for the league you ſpeake of with the Rebels of Scotland, I thinke there was none, and the euent did ſhew what Rebels they were. But this I thinke, they were as weary to haue ſo many of you there, as wee were weary to haue you ſo neare vs. And therein I thinke the Queenes Maieſty & they did agree. And to excuſe the refuſe of the ratification, by the not comming in for the Scotiſh Lords, hath ſmall reaſon to beare it: ſo the Treaty made betwixt the French King then, and the Queen of England, might haue been ratified notwithſtanding, whatſoeuer was betwixt him and the Scotiſh Lords his Subiect: for our fact and peace did not ſtand vpon their doings, which Treaty becauſe it was not ratified, I ſay, the Queene my Soueraignes title to the poſſeſſion of Callis, by reaſon of that attempt, ſtandeth whole and entire vnto her.

The Scotiſh Lords ſcandalized.

But ſir ſaid he (ſpeaking to the King) to ſay the truth I haue no commiſſions, nor any commandement or authority to diſpute or anſwere in theſe matters, but onely to demand Callis and the other Fortreſſes and places according to the Treaty, which is ſo plain, that to mine opinion, there need be no controuerſie. And if there be any doubt, now the time expired doth put it out of all doubt. Bnt becauſe you and the Queene haue charged mee that I know ſo much of the matter, as I cannot deny ſomewhat I doe, as hauing been at the doing of a great deale & the diſpute; Somewhat I muſt, and may ſay for my ſelfe, leſt it ſhould be thought that there were nothing to be ſaid. Marry as I ſaid, as Commiſſioner from the Queene my Soueraigne, I haue nothing to ſay, but the demands onely, the matter being plain and in right iudgement, without controuerſie, and alſo that I ſee no perſon here but ſuch as be parties, and no competent perſon to bee Iudge of the controuerſie. Whereunto the conſtable replied and ſaide, Who ſhould bee iudge of that which is the Kings but himſelfe? it is his, and none could take or giue it to any other but himſelfe: With that the Queene mother asked Monſieur Chancelier, Why he did not ſpeake.

No Commiſſion to argue the title but to demand Callis.

The Conſtable.

Queen Mo.

Monſieur Chancellor.

(54) Who after ſome pauſe, beganne a long and well compoſed oration, the ſum whereof was this: That the preſent Kings right to Callis was long before any claime could be made thereunto by the Engliſh, which was not much aboue two hundred yeeres, and then was it got by the fortune of warre; but more anciently, that it had been the inheritance of France, none can deny, as being vpon the Continent thereof, and not vpon any Engliſh ground. King Edward (quoth he) wee grant wan it, and your father noble King rewanne it to his Crowne. But the Engliſh will ſay they haue poſſeſſed and enioyed it many yeeres: Why ſo they did Aquitaine, Gaſcoigne, and Guyen, and other dominions beſides, which they claimed by our Elinor, the repudiate of the King of France, who was inheritrix vnto it: indeed ſome titles they had, yet ſo as they held them of the Crowne of France: for the whole, which is Gallia, appertaineth to you ſir our King: and ſo doth Callis which is of no great antiquity that I can read of: for Countie Boloigne was the firſt that did incloſe it, being afore but a Burgard, as the moſt part of the Townes of France then were. At the battell of Creſſy, dolorous to vs, King Edward of England after nine moneths ſiege, by compoſition had it ſurrendred, the poore inhabitants pardoned of life at the great ſuit of his good Queene, elſe had they died euery mothers ſonne, and ſo with white wands in their hands were expelled the towne: To whom the King of France was ſo mercifull, that hee commanded of euery thing vacant, they ſhould bee the firſt prouided for. And I thinke when your Father King Henry tooke it, the Engliſh were likewiſe ſo ſerued. Theſe claime two hundred yeeres poſſeſſion, the others before them, aboue fiue hundred yeeres: thus God doth to puniſh, or to eſſay his ſeruants. And although the Engliſh claimed Gaſcoigne, and Guyen, by ſucceſſion of Elioner, although Normandy by one William, and Pontieur by a Dowry of their mother, daughter of Philip de Bel: yet to Callis they had no right, but onely by Armes, and by Armes your Father againe recouered it. But ſome will ſay, by the peace at Bretigny, they haue right; I ſay no; for euery man knowes what exceptions were taken at that peace: and ſome, that ſo long a poſſeſſion makes a precription; I ſay no, for Preſcription is among priuate men, but among Princes, preſcription cannot ſtand; and yet theirs was not much aboue two hundred, ours aboue eight hundred yeeres. But to you Monſieur L' Ambaſſadour, I will ſay, that at the peace of Troes in Champaign, were your ſelfe and Monſieur Throckmorton, both of you moſt able in ſuch affaires and nothing therein done, I doubt not without the Queen and Councels conſent: no one word was ſpoken of Callis, which chiefly was the cauſe of the warre; ſo that all ſtandeth clear for al which was then talked vpon, and is a plain confeſſion, that they did acquit their right thereunto. This Article I ſay is tranſlatinus in the peace of Caſteau in Cambreſis, and is no more, but ſuch as forgetfulneſſe, or becauſe

What Callis had been.

The French Kings compaſſion vpon the expulſed of Callis

Among Princes Preſcription auaileth not.

becauſe all ſmall things cannot bee mentioned in conference. But Callis was the chiefe point, which being omitted, I ſay by meaning it was acquitted. But now to your reaſons Monſieur L'ambaſſador; the Article for the loſſe of Callis at that treaty was forced in by you the Engliſh, who of all nations bee the moſt wary and circumſpect in making their peaces. Whereupon the Queene of England, layeth to vs a ſuſpition, a iealouſie, a coniecture, a geſſe, that a King of France would haue inuaded England. But euery ſuſpition muſt not make a breake: for ſo whenſoeuer any Prince ſhould arme his men vpon iuſt occaſion, his neighbours might ſay it was againſt him. And ſo doe you Engliſh lay geſſes againſt the late King Francis the ſecond. But the Queene of England with open face inuaded the Kings Realme, with a goodly pretence to keepe the townes to the Kings vſe, yet when all was reduced into their due obedience, ſhe would keep the town of Newhauen as a pledge for Callis, by which deed ſhee hath loſt all her right in Callis, God indeed hath made a naturall ſeparation betwixt you and vs, a ſure wall of defence, Et penitus toto diuiſos orbe Britannos: So that naturally you ought to haue nothing but peace and amity with ours. But doe not thinke Monſieur L' Ambaſſador that I ſay this as fearing what you can doe, for there was neuer any King of France ſince Charlemans ſo great as the King is now, had ſo many men of warre, ſo ready, and ſo good Souldiers: and yet his Highneſſe doth deſire the amity of the Queene of England, and the loue of that nation: of which there is the more hope if all theſe pretences and demaunds were cancelled, and Callis forgotten, which hath been the continuall pickequarrell betwixt theſe two Realmes. You neuer read Monſieur Smith, that the French euer inuaded England, I ſpeake it not to your diſpraiſe which are Engliſh, but to your praiſe; yet this I thinke, had there not been ſo eaſie a deſcent, ſo conuenient a place, and ſo ready, for you to make warre here, ye would not (as I ſuppoſe) haue come hither ſo often and troubled our Country, nor the amity betwixt you and vs; And I dare boldly affirme and gage any thing, that the Queene of England ſhall gaine more by continuall peace with vs, then ſhee ſhall doe by Callis, & therefore your Queene muſt leaue off theſe demands and quarrels, and come to a perfect peace with vs. which ſhal be more profitable for both the Realmes: and this I dare aſſure you, here is no Councellor among vs that dare once open his mouth to render you Callis, for my part, I will not be one to moue or aſſent thereunto. Nor I, ſaid the Conſtable, and ſo all the reſt.

The French had rather make faults then ſee faults.

A faire ſhew to skar the Engliſh.

Callis a continall pick-quarell.

The Conſtable.

(55) Then quoth Sir Thomas Smith, Monſieur Chancelier, mee thinkes you fetch your Title very farre to haue Callis, and howſoeuer the poſſeſſion, was come by, by and by the right is his in poſſeſſion, then by your reaſon all our diſputation is in vaine, and it maketh no matter, bonáne an mala fide poſſideat, the King once in poſſeſſion, as a thing returning to his primer eſtate poſtliminio or gotten of the enemy, yee admit no contract, or latter treaty, ſo as it doth appeare, yee open that which was thought of ſome men, and alwaies ſpoken, that what promiſe ſoeuer was made, the French would neuer render Callis againe to the Engliſh, but keepe it ſtill, per ius, nefaſque: this reaſoning paſſeth all anſwere, for whatſoeuer the Queen of England had done quàm ſanctè, ſo euer ſhee had kept her treaty of this eight yeeres, though ye could obiect nothing againſt her, yet ſhe ſhould neuer haue had Callis reſtored; to this kind of reaſoning and to that, that no man dare moue the King to render it being due, I cannot anſwere; but to this that toucheth my fact in the making of the Peace in Champaigne, where I muſt confeſſe, and am not aſhamed, that I was a Miniſter, I doe not yet acknowledge that either I am worthy to bee accounted ſo wiſe as you would make mee, nor our Nations alwaies ſo circumſpect in making Treatiſes with you your owne Writers auerring otherwiſe, and giue you the praiſe therein againſt vs. But for the point wherein you touch vs, that the peace at Troes ſhould be uouatio contractus, and wee ſhould thereby acquit our right of Callis, it is Antiſtrophon, and turneth a great deale better vpon you. For if becauſe our talke was of our right to Callis, by reaſon of the attempt in Scotland, you of the forfeiture of it by reaſon of the decent to Newhauen, neither condiſcending to other, and not concluding thereupon, wee did agree vpon that Peace. And if that Peace, doth make nouationem, then the forfeiture of our right by keeping Newhauen, which you impute to vs, is wiped away, nouated and clenſed by this Peace, and our right which was not yet in eſſe, & cuius dies nondum venit, remaineth ſtil. So as it toucheth you rather then vs, and by this meanes haue you nothing to ſay againſt vs, but wee ſtill our right againſt you. But the truth is, as Monſieur Le Conneſtable here can tell, who was partly the occaſion that we came to it; for when this was contended, that Callis was already due vnto vs, you, that wee had forfaited it, ſo that wee could enter into no other Article of peace, why ſaid you; haue not wee the wit to make a peace, and make no mention of Callis? neither to ſpeake of it one way, nor other: your times not yet come to ask it, let vs liue in peace in the meane while, and let each Prince haue right ſuch as it is, reſerued; whereupon you Monſieur L'Ambeſpine were one of the firſt that came with vs, and you know what paſſed.

The French the cauſe that Callis was not mentioned in the peace

(56) Tea (ſaith hee) but wee would neuer grant that it ſhould bee put in, that you ſhould haue Callis: you ſay true (ſaid Sir Thomas) nor wee that the Queens Maieſty ſhould acquit it, nor the hoſtages neither. But in the end when it came to the Concluſion, as the Biſhoppe of Orleans, and Monſieur Bourdin can tell, it was agreed, that expreſſly the right be reſerued, aſwell to that, as to any other thing, not expreſſly there mentioned: Omnes aliapetitiones & demand & ſimiliter exceptiones, & defenſiones as appeareth by the Treaty. And as touching Newhauen, Monſieur Chancelier, note in it two things. The one the firſt entry, the other, the keeping after the peace agreed vpon amongſt your ſelues. As for the firſt entry, I deny that our men of warre made any inuaſion or came by force. But being requeſted and deſired aid of a great number of Noblemen, and other who were in perill and danger. And whether did they like inuaders (I aske for all the time that they were not aſſailed) ſpoile any, or robbe any; no, they tooke not an henne or an egge, but they paide for it: I, if any complaine I offer to pay it: This is no inuaſion, nor no hoſtility: but the act of a friend, and at their requeſts and purſuits, wh oſe doings ſir, aſwell for matter of Armes, as for other things done in that tumult, you haue declared by Edict to haue been done á bon fin et pour voſtre ſeruice, which may truly bee ſaid, for by their means and defence, a great number of your good Subiects aſwell men as women, aſwell Captaines as Souldiers, of whom Monſieur le Chancelier did now boaſt, as of other not Souldiers, are ſaued now to doe you ſeruice, which elſe ſhould haue been a prey and ſpoile to them which ſought but the ruin of halfe or third part at the leaſt of your Realme. For the conſeruation of whom, yee in part may thanke the Queen my Miſtreſſe. And this for the firſt deſcent of our men. Now where Monſieur Chancellier ſaith, that the Queen my Miſtreſſe changed her pretence, I ſtil doe ſay ſhee kept her firſt proteſtation. That ſhee would appropriate no Land Towne, nor Fortreſſe of the Kings to her, nor ſhee did neuer claime Newhauen as hers, but comming peaceably into it, hauing beene at great charge and coſt, it was both wiſdome and reaſon all other being ſatisfied and content, ſhee ſhould at the leaſt haue ſome reaſon offered her in her right to Callis. And otherwiſe ſhe did not hold Newhauen, which thing was manifeſtly declared at Gallion, where Articles were drawn not vnreaſonable, and the matter ſo farre forward, that they were ſigned with my hand, and tarried but for power and Commiſſion to affirme them. But the mortality and peſtilence growing ſo great in Newhauen

Newhauen, gaue too much aduantage, which was taken; and the reasonable dealings in this matter broke off; other meaning her Maiesty had none.

(57) No said the Constable, what meant such preparation, and prouision? I cannot skill of things; but in that arte wherein I haue been brought vp and exercised all my life, I can skill a little. There was such a number of Horse harnesse for the carte: such a number of Artillery, such prouisions of Gammons of Bacon, Cheese and other things, and aboue fiue thousand men, that am I sure went out of it, besides all those that were dead: can you make me beleeue that all this was for Newhauen alone? No Monsieur (said he) I know what belongeth too a Towne of Warre. Yea, said another, and the Ships also that came. Nay sayd the Constable they came to late. Why, said the Queene-mother smiling, will you make vs beleeue that all that preparation was for Newhauen alone?

(58) Wisedome would, Madam, quoth Sir Thomas Smith, because the sea & winde doe not serue at all times, that there should be good store of all manner of prouision. No, no (said shee) there was a further meaning, but as you haue quitted Newhauen, so must you quit Callis, and let vs be friends, neuer talke more of these demands, nor of the sums of money for which yee had Hostages. All is gone from you quite. Your Queene in comming to Newhauen, hath quitted all. Shee must forget that matter cleane, and let vs be friends still. The King my sonne doth offer as much friendship as need to bee, but as for Callis, ye must neuer speake of it. It is hard, Madame, said Sir Thomas Smith, for a man to forget his right, or not to remember a wrong offered. Nay; no wrong sayd shee, you haue heard what Monsieur Le Chancellier hath said, and what all these of my sonnes Counsell doe say. Madame (quoth he) it is for the most part seen that men be partiall in their owne causes, I doe assure you, that the Queene my Soueraigne doth thinke that she hath as good right to Callis as to any Towne in England: and so doe all her Counsell: and whatsoeuer yee haue heard, I am able to say for her right euen out of hand, but they a great deale more. But Sir, quoth Sir Thomas, is this the finall answeer I shall haue? Yea said the King, That yee will not render Callis vnto her Maiesty according to the Treaty, nor pay the fiue hundred thousand Crowns which is for the peine.

(59) No, said the King, I will keepe them both according to the Treaty: wel then said Sir Thomas I haue no more to say, but to bring this report to her Maiesty, which I shall be sorry to doe: and thereupon himselfe, and Sir Henry Norris, rose vp to depart, doing their obeisance- But you take not your leaue, Monsieur L'ambassadors for altogether said the Queene. Yes forsooth said Sir Thomas. Doe you intend to come no more at court? No Madam, except the Kings Maiesty, doe command me. But I am sorry to carry this answere so precise; and that there is so little regard of the Queene my Soueraignes right. No right, said the Queen, for if there were any, the King my sonne would be loth to offer her any wrong: yee haue heard all the reasons, I marueil that you will take vpon you, you that are learned to defend so vniust a cause. Ah Madame (said he) I see well, it is true on your part, that men be blinde in their owne causes and aduantages. Surely (quoth shee) the Queene (my good sister) shall haue more aduantage thus as it is, then to demand Callis. And I pray you perswade her. I Madame, against her right? You must not say so, I pray you commend me heartily to the Queene, my good sister, and desire her to keepe the amity and loue which is betwixt her and my sonne, and I shall bee ready to doe her what seruice or pleasure I can, quoth the Queen: and so said the King. Thus this conference ended, and Callis kept still by the French.

(60) Now as these distastures fell betwixt England and France, and these broken Couenants ministred occasions to set each against others: So at the same time, the affaires of Scotland was carried with so violent a motion as set the Lords at dissentions, and the land in ciuill sedition; so as not onely outrages were committed vpon the best subiects, but euen vpon the vertuous King and Queene themselues, him they shamefully murdered in a most barbarous manner, and her they tooke prisoner, forced her to resigne gouernment, and lastly to flye into forraine parts for succour. But knowing that this Subiect is to be writ with a farre more noble pen, and our extant relations from vncertainty and suspected reports, we will surcease to intermeddle in the particulars of that Queenes affaires, excepting onely in such entercourses of State, as are wouen in ours, and cannot otherwise be auoided without maime of History; this onely in generall.

(61) Mary Queene of Scotland hauing imbarked her selfe for France, where shee well hoped to finde many friends; by contrary windes (accompanied with sixteene persons) landed at Werkinton in Cumberland, and from thence was conueied to Carlile, to Bolton Castle, & lastly to the custody of the Earle of Shrewesbury. Whose troubles and misfortune, Q. Elizabeth both pitied and sought to redresse, writing in her behalfe vnto the Regent of Scotland, and blaming the Lords of the many wrongs done to their Queen, which indeed were intollerable to royall authority, and such, as other Princes could not but seeke to redresse, and reuenge; notwithstanding such was the distasture of those distempered Lords, or the frownes of those fatall times, that in England she remained euer after during her life.

(62) As the iealousies grew great betwix these two great Queenes Elizabeth and Mary, by the working instruments of the Pope, and forraine Princes; so by the like meanes, were the like discontents bred and nourished in some of the greatest English Peeres towards their Soueraigne, wose Peace, vnder pretext of Religion, they irreligiously disturbed. Among these, the first in ranke, time and disloialtie, were the two Earles of Northumberland and Westmorland, who with Leonard Dacres, Neuil, Norton Tempest, Danby, and others, purposed on the sudden to haue surprized the Earle of Sussex, the Queen Lieutenant of the North in his house at Cawood; but therein preuented, they were enforced to keepe secret their intents, till some fit occasion should chance to be ministred. They had in readinesse against the rising certaine Englisb Priests, Morton and others, with Bulles and instruments of absolution, reconciliation, and taking of Oathes to the Pope and his doctrine, which was not so secretly done, but that Queene Elizabeths vigilant Counsellors had an inkling thereof.

(63) Thomas Piercy; (so was Northumberlands Eare named) lying at his Castle of Topcliffe in Yorkeshire, had gone so farre in his intended purposes, as he could not returne; who being sent for vnto the Court, strucke great amazement and sudden feare into the other conspirators hearts: and his own guilty minde was much more distracted, vpon notice that some forces were aproching for his apprehension; whereupon all affrighted, he rose from his bed, and caused the Bels to be rung in a most confused manner, so that the Townesmen raised, all sought to defend and follow him their chiefe Lord,

(64) The nest thus broken before the birds could well flye, he departed to Branspeth, where he met with Charles Neuill Earle of Westmorland, and his following consorts; who ioining in Councell, made no conscience to vndoe many true subiects, and innocent men: For abusing the Queenes name in their Proclamations & Commissions, they commanded the Country to follow them in Armes; sometimes pretending the safety of her Maiesties person in danger (they said) by Treasons in working; and sometimes in case of Conscience for restoring their former Religion, which if themselues should neglect, other forraigne Prince (said they) would doe, to the no little perill of the Realme.

vp his golden Calues, where they rent and tare the Bible, in as great a contempt, as Ioachim did the rowle that Ieremy wrote: at Darington they besprinkled their host with holy water, for feare of spirits, and at Rippon heard Masse, to forward their Treason, with the assistance of that Propitiatory Sacrifice. Whence, with Banners displaied, they entred Borowbrigge, old Norton being their Ancient, whose Ensigne was the Crosse, and fiue wounds of our Lord.

(66) From thence they went to Tadcaster, Wetherby, and Bramham Moore, where they mustered sixteene hundred Horsemen, and foure thousand footemen, intending therewith to march vnto Yorke. But their mindes altering, they fell vpon Barnards Castle, which after eleuen daies resistance, was yeelded vnto them: which fortuuate entrance did so animate their rebellious conceits, as that in their letters sent to their fauourers, they daigned their Soueraigne no better stile, then Elizabeth the late Queene, pretended Queene, and no Queene indeed: as likewise did the Countesse of Northumberland in her Letter sent vnto Stuckley, and* others of the faction, in far worse termes.

(67) These things diuulged, and their rebellions still going on, Proclamations came forth denouncing them Traitors to their Queene and Countrey; and the Lord Scroope Warden of the West-Marches, with the assistance of the Earle of Cumberland, and other Genlemen of the Country, kept the Castle of Carlile, while Sir Iohn Foster warden of the Middle-Marches, accompanied with Sir Henry Percie, exercised their manly resistance against these proud Rebels.

The Earle of Sussex leades against the Rebels.

(68) To withstand their still-growing outrage, Thomas Earle of Sussex (her Maiesties Lieutenant Generall of the North) gathered some forces; whose Lieutenant for the footmen was Edward Earle of Rutland: and for the Horsemen, was Henry Lord Hunsdon, Lord Warden of the East-Marches, William Lord Eure leading the rereward. These followed the enemy to North Allerton, Croftbridge, Alke, Durham, Newcastle and Hexam, euen close at their heeles; whose power was so weake, and purse so empty, (being defrauded of an hundred thousand Crownes, promised them by the Pope to maintaine the Rebellion) as that those Rebellious heads entred conference with Edward Dacres at Naworth, of their desperate estate, being both monlesse and powerlesse to withstand the puissance of the Lord Generall, now on their backes, as also the Earles of Warwicke, and Lincolne, the Lords Ferrers, Willowby, and Howard, approaching very neere them, euen at Borow-brigges. No other succour their consultations could pitch on, then by flight into Scotland, vnto those Lords that there stood out for the Romish.

The chiefe Rebels flye into Scotland.

(69) So the night following they put it in practise, not bidding their intrapped traine once farewell, which as Sheepe without a Shepheard, stood gazing at their owne destructions, whilest Sussex surprized them without any resistance. The remaining ringleaders executed.

(70) Not warned by these successes (which vsually proue vnhappy, in such disloyall attempts) Leonard Dacres of Harlesey began to gather head againe; whose aiders were the more resolute, in reuenge of their friends executed; and women also became stout Souldiers in quarrell of their husbands, all forward enough, and too forward to mischief. These vpon a More neere vnto Naworth, to impeach the Lord Hunsdon that made thitherward; had set downe their battell in a triangle forme, where they continued a long and most desperate conflict, but in the end were forced to giue backe, and Dacres to flie from his slaine, wounded, and scattered people, towards Scotland, the then-Refuge of Traiterous transfugers.

(71) Scotland thus harbouring those disloiall English, and their owne Lords diuided into seuerall factions, some of them sought to conceale, and some to apprehend these guilty Earles; so that Westmorland, was shifted away into Flanders, but Northumberland, taken by the Regent, and committed to Custody, was afterwards sent into England, where hauing beene attainted by Parliament, vpon the twenty two of August was beheaded at Yorke: vsing liberty of speeches, in auowing the Popes Supremacy, denying subiection vnto his Soueraigne Queene, affirming the Realme to be in a Schisme, and her obedient Subiects, no better then Heretickes. Charles Westmorland his consort, a person vtterly wasted by loosenesse of life, euen by Gods iust iudgement, in the time of his rebellion, was bereaued of children, and afterwards wandring in forraigne parts, had his body eaten with vlcers of lewd causes, as is most constantly reported. But from these temporall proceedings (being the Domesticke effects of a forraign cause) let vs a while behold the spirituall flourish of the Popes leaden sword, vnsheathed at Rome, to enspirit and enflame such traiterous dispositions against Englands Queene.

(72) Nicholas Mooreton an Eglishman, made Bishop by Pius Quintus, that Pontificall and surlie Pope of Rome, who now hauing turned the key of his Consistory, and set wide open the dores vnto the complaints of his Clergy, against those Christian Princes that vrged subiection to their positiue Lawes (a Note indeed ill sounding in the eares of his sons) amongst others, this puppet Bishop, commenced a feined suite and plea against Queene Elizabeth, whom thereupon Pius (like a transcendent Iudge) depriued from all Princely authority, as one vncapable either of Crowne, or Gouernment, and with the curse of his impious mouth, sent forth his Bull to goare her Maiesty, like to those of Bashan, that encompassed Dauid; the tenour whereof (if the words corrupt not the aire, and the inke the eies of the beholders) shall stand for euer as a Pillar of Salt, and Monument of shame to that man of sinne; the transcript whereof, taken from the originall it selfe, is as followeth.

The ſame in Engliſh.

The declaratory ſentence of the Vniuerſall Biſhop, Pope Pius the fift, againſt Elizabeth the pretended Queene of England, and againſt the Heretikes that take her part.

Wherein alſo all her ſubiects are declared to be abſolued from the Oath of Allegiance, and any other duty whatſoeuer, and beſides, they that doe obey her, are pronounced accurſed.

Pius the ſeruant of the ſeruants of God, for remembrance hereof in time to come.

(74) He that raigneth aboue, to whom is giuen all power in Heauen and Earth, hath committed in fulneſſe of power to be gouerned, one holy Catholike and Apoſtolike Church (where-out is no ſaluation) to one onely in Earth, namely, Peter the Prince of the Apoſtles, and to the Romane Biſhop the Succeſſor of Peter. And him alone hath he made Chiefe ouer all Nations and Kingdomes, who may roote out, deſtroy, ſcatter, waſte, plant, and build: that the faithfull people knit together with the band of mutuall Charity, might be kept in the vnity of the Spirit, and preſented in health and ſafety vnto their Sauiour. For the vndergoing of which office, we being called by the goodneſſe of God to the gouernment of the ſaid Church, doe refuſe and omit no paines, labouring by all meanes that this vnity and Catholike Religion (which the Author thereof for the triall of the faith of thoſe that be his, and for our correction and amendment, hath ſuffered to be toſſed with ſo great afflictions) might be preſerued whole and entire. But the number of the wicked hath ſo much encreaſed in power, that now there is no place in the World left, which they haue not attempted to corrupt by moſt wicked Doctrine; among the reſt, Elizabeth the ſeruant of ſinfulneſſe, the pretenſed and vnlawfull Queene of England, with whom, as in a Sanctuary the moſt wicked Perſons of all doe finde a refuge. This Queene, ruling the Kingdome, and monſtrouſly vſurping to her ſelfe the place of the ſupreme Head of the Church throughout all England, and the chiefe authority and iuriſdiction of the ſame, hath reuoked againe to miſerable ruine this very Kingdome, which was in a manner recouered againe to the Catholike faith, and good deuotion. For the vſe of the true Religion (which the moſt lawfull Queene, Mary of famous memory, by the helpe of this Seate had repayred, being before by the Apoſtata, Henry the eight, ouerthrowne) now by ſtrong hand reſtrained, and the errours of Heretikes imbraced and followed; ſhee hath remoued the Councell of State that conſiſted of the Engliſh Nobility, and fild the ſame with obſcure hereticall fellowes; ſhee hath oppreſſed the Profeſſors of the Catholike faith, and hath ſet vp wicked Preachers and Miniſters of impieties. Shee hath aboliſhed the Sacrifice of the Maſſe, Prayers, Almes, difference of meate, ſingle life, and Catholike rites. Shee hath commanded Bookes to bee ſet forth containing manifeſt Hereſie, and her ſelfe vſing and obſeruing wicked Rites and Inſtitutions, according to Caluins preſcription; hath alſo commanded them to be obſerued by her Subiects. Shee hath preſumed to caſt out Biſhops of Churches, Rectors, and other Catholike Prieſts, from their Churches and Benefices, and to diſpoſe of them and other Eccleſiaſticall liuings among Hereticall men; preſuming alſo to iudge of Church matters, ſhee hath forbidden the Prelates, the Church and People, that they ſhould not acknowledge the Romane Church, nor that they obey his Precepts and Canonicall Iniunctions; ſhee hath compelled many to yeeld to her wicked lawes, and to forſweare and abiure the authority and obedience of the Romane Biſhop, and to acknowledge her by their Oath, the onely Gouernour in temporall and ſpirituall matters; ſhee hath impoſed penalties and puniſhments vpon thoſe which were not obedient to her command, and hath exacted the like vpon them which perſeuered in the vnity of the Faith, and in the aforeſaid obedience; ſhee hath caſt into Priſon the Catholike Gouernours and Rectors of Churches, where many, laden with daily languiſhings and ſorrow, haue wofully ended their liues. All which things, foraſmuch as they are notorious and manifeſt to all Nations, and ſo approued by the moſt graue teſtimony of very many, that no way is left them for excuſe, defence, or euaſion: We moued by the impieties and miſchiefes that more and more multiply, beſides the grieuances of the faithfull, the affliction of Religion which groweth daily more intollerable by the meanes and working of the ſaid Elizabeth, whoſe minde is ſo hardned and indurate, that ſhee hath not onely contemned the godly prayers and admonitions of Catholike Princes for her health and conuerſion, but alſo hath not ſuffered the meſſengers of this See to come into England to her about this buſineſſe; We, I ſay, moued by theſe cauſes, haue of neceſſity betaken our ſelues to the weapons of Iuſtice againſt her, not being able to refraine from griefe and ſorrow, that wee muſt needes puniſh ſuch a one, whoſe Anceſtors haue ſo well deſerued of the Common-weale, and of all Chriſtendome. Being therefore ſtrengthned with his authority, who hath pleaſed to ſet vs in this ſupreame Throne of Iuſtice, though vnfit for ſo great a burthen, wee by the fulneſſe of our Apoſtolike power, doe declare the foreſaid Elizabeth an Hereticke, and a maintainer of Heretickes, and thoſe that take her part in the things aforeſaid, to haue incurred the ſentence of Anathema, and to be cut off from the vnity of Chriſts Body. And moreouer that ſhee is depriued of the pretenced right of her ſaid Kingdome, and alſo from all Rule, dignity, and prehemineuce whatſoeuer, and alſo her Nobility, Subiects, and People of the ſaid Realme, and all other which haue ſworne vnto her, by any manner of meanes, are abſolued for euer from ſuch Oath, and from all duty of Empire, fidelity, and obedience, in ſuch ſort as we doe abſolue them by the authority of theſe preſents, and depriue the ſaid Elizabeth of the pretenced right of the Kingdome, and of all other things aforeſaid. And wee doe command and forbid all and ſingular of the Nobility, Subiects, People, and other aforeſaid, that they preſume not to obey her admonitions, commands, nor lawes. Whoſoeuer ſhall doe otherwiſe, we doe enwrap them in the like curſe. And becauſe it were too difficult a matter to beare theſe preſents to euery place where there is need, we will that the Copies of them being ſigned with the hand of the publike Notary, and the Eccleſiaſticall Prelate, or with the Seale of his Court, haue the ſame credit and authority in Court, and without it with all Nations euery where, that the preſents themſelues ſhould haue if they were exhibited. Iſaiah 59.5. The fruits and effects of the Popes Bull.

(75) The webbe thus wouen by theſe Spiders of Rome, and the Cockatrices Egge hatched into a Serpent, many were imployed to patch vp this garment of iniquity, and Spirits ſent abroad to corrupt Englands ſweet ayre; the one ſort, plotters of inuaſions to lay the Land waſte, and the other, conſpirators againſt her annointed perſon. The chiefe of either in this place, (omitting the order of Annales) that they may ranke together without interruption of better narrations, and not infect the paper in more places then one, I will here lay downe; aſſuring my ſelfe, that many more attempts were plotted, then euer were diſplayed. For the thunderbolt of curſes throwne from that Iupiter of Rome, denounced her Maieſty vncapable either of Crowne or Kingdome, tooke ſuch rootes in the hearts of theſe Locuſts, that they both armed themſelues openly to battell, and ſecretly ſought to imbrue their barbarous hands in their Princes bloud. Apoc.

(76) For this Brutiſh Bull, calued in the Popes Conſiſtory (or rather Cow-houſe) and now able to trauell from Rome; in London, and at the Weſt ende of Pauls, firſt put forth his hornes, being there hung vpon the Biſhops Pallace Gate, by a lewd perſon imployed as an Herauld from the Pope. Moreton an old Engliſh fugitiue, (as hath been ſaid) had procured it: brazen-faced Sanders in his writings maintaineth it, Briſtow in his Motiues approued it, Northumberland and Neuil had put it in practiſe, Iohn Felton had diuulged it, the two Nortons ſupported it, and many after-followers aſſaid to execute it; all which, like Serpents bite the boſomes wherein themſelues lay, but neuer could hurt her, the Lords beloued, and holy Annointed, who in peace and glory came to her graue, in a full age, as a ricke of Corne into the Barne in due ſeaſon. The Popes Bull hanged vp at the Biſhop of Londons gate. Patrons and abettors of the Bull. Sand. de Viſibil. Monarch. Briſtow Motiue 6. Iob 5. 26.

(77) The Marſhaliſts, beſides them in the North, were Iohn Throckmorton, Thomas Brooke, and George Redman, with others, who intended with ſound of Trumpet and Drum, to proclaime their diuelliſh deſigne at Harleſton Fayre, in the County of Norfolke; their ſhew being for the ſuppreſſion of Strangers, but their maine end, to make a ſtrange alteration in the State; whereby they haſtened their owne ends, ſuffering a death due to Traytors. A.D.1570. Execution of certain Traytors.

(78) But more dangerous were thoſe Conſpiratours, which ſecretly plotted to bring in forraigne powers, or publikely by their writings animated men thereunto, defaming the faire face of Englands Religion, and deforming the body of Elizabeths Gouernment; in which kinde Sanders and Briſtow, two Engliſh fugitiues, were the Iannes and Iambres that withſtood Moſes; men of corrupt mindes, and enemies to the Faith; Traytors, heady, and high minded, hauing a ſhew of godlineſſe, but denying the power thereof, as the Apoſtle propheſied, that in the laſt dayes ſuch ſhould ariſe: both of them approuing Pius Quintus his proceeding about her Maieſties depriuation, and iuſtifying the wicked in their Rebellions, contrary to the Doctrine of that Apoſtle, whoſe Chayre they pretend to vphold. From which ſinke of iniquity, iſſued thoſe corrupt ſtreames, that became bitter as wormwood, the taſte whereof brought many to their vntimely, but wel-deſerued deaths: among whom, firſt was Felton, the two Nortons, Kenelme Barne, and Edmund Mather; not long after whom, followed Doctor Story, who may not bee forgotten in our Story. Secret inſtruments to draw in forraine enemies into the Land. 2 Tim. 3. 8. 1 Pet. 2. 13. Apoc. 8. 11. Iuſtice executed vpon certaine Traytors.

(79) This man by birth was Engliſh, though an Alien in heart, by Profeſſion a Ciuilian, and Doctor of the Canon Law, a perſecutor of Gods Saints in the dayes of the laſt Queene, and in this Queenes raigne, a turbulent inueigher againſt the Religion eſtabliſhed in the Engliſh Church. For which being apprehended and committed to Priſon, he found meanes of eſcape, and in Antwerpe receiued Commiſſion vnder Duke D'Alua, to ſearch all Ships comming thither for Engliſh Bookes; not forgetting his tyranny wherein he had beene trayned, nor to further trayterouſly many and great attempts to bring in forraine powers for Englands ouerthrow. But the pit that he digged, he fell into himſelfe, and the deſtruction prepared for others, light on his owne pate; for one Parker, an Engliſh Merchant, loyally affected to his Prince, trading to Antwerpe, laid his ſnare faire to catch this foule Bird; cauſing ſecret notice to be giuen vnto Story, that in his Ship were ſtore of Hereticall Bookes, with other intelligences, which might ſtand him in ſteed. Doctor Story. His impriſonment and flight. His imployments beyond the Sea.

(80) The Canoniſt conceiuing that all was Cock-ſure,

Cocke-ſure, haſted to execute his Commiſſion himſelfe, where with lookes very bigge vpon the poore Mariners, each Cabbin, Cheſt, and Corner, aboue board were ſearched, and ſome things found to draw him further on; ſo that the Hatches muſt be opened, which ſeemed to bee vnwillingly done, and great ſignes of feare was ſhewed by their faces. This drew on the Doctor to deſcend into the hould; where now in the Trap, the Mouſe might well gnaw, but could not get out: for the Hatches went downe, and the Sayles hoyſed vp, which with a merry gale were blowne into England, where ere long hee was arraigned, and condemned of high Treaſon, and accordingly was executed at Tyborne, as hee had well deſerued.

(81) To the like end came Sherwin, Campion, Kirby, with others ſeditious Trumpetters of this infamous Bull, and Sanders the Iriſh Legate, the greateſt maintainer of his goaring authority, though he eſcaped the Barre of Iuſtice, yet was found out by a raging Phrenſie, as he wandred ſuccourleſſe in the waſte Mountaines of Ireland, wherein laſtly he miſerably dyed. But to leaue theſe poyſonous tonguemen and libellous Pen-men to regiſter their owne ſhame, and ſeare their conſciences with the brand of ſinne; let vs diſcouer thoſe other daring and ſwording Monſters, who actually imployed themſelues to lay either violent hands vpon her Maieſties perſon, or the Land open to forraigne Inuaſions.

(82) The firſt of them (or firſt manifeſted) was Iohn Sommerſile of Elſtowe in Warwickeſhire, a furious young man, who like a tempeſt that threatned deſtruction, came ragingly forward towards the Court, with intent to murther the Queene; the progreſſe of which attempt ſummarily was thus. Keeping his Whitſontide with Arden, (his Wiues Father) he was there ſo wrought by Hall a Seminary Prieſt, as hee conceiued a deſperate rage againſt her Maieſty, holding it a matter (ſeeing there was no hope of alteration during the life of the Queene) meritorious to make her away; to which bloudy reſolution, he was further inſtigated by his wicked wife. Whereupon returning home, he grew much perplexed, hauing many feares and conflicts in himſelfe, which cauſed his Wife to write vnto Hall, to come and ſtrengthen the man with firmer reſolutions. But he, buſied elſewhere with the like purpoſes, by Letter excuſed his not comming, yet therein aduiſed him to goe forward, promiſing he would aſſiſt him with his prayers to God for his good ſucceſſe.

(83) This Letter receiued, he grew fully reſolued to actuate the deſigne, and haſted his iourney amaine towards London; who no ſooner departed, but that his wife ſent Halles Letter vnto her Mother, and ſhee preſently made it knowne to Arden her Huſband, which Letter he cauſed to be burnt, as ſoone as himſelfe was called in queſtion. But Sommerſile diſcouered by the way, was indited in Warwicke, and thoſe his Aſſociates condemned of high Treaſon in London; Sommerſile confeſſing his intent, ſaid, that he had been moued thereunto by his wicked ſpirit, and by the inticements of certaine ſeditious perſons, his Kinſmen and Allies, together with the often reading of pernicious Bookes, publiſhed againſt her Maieſty. (84) Of which litter in the dayes of this bleſſed Deborah, not ſo few as one hundred and twenty of knowne Ieſuites and Seminaries ſcrawled like frogs, through her faire ſoyle, croaking, and ſpawning their doctrine to recall obedience to the Pope, and diſſwading the Subiects from the allegeance vnto their Queene: Of this number fifty three with pardon of life were baniſhed the Land, and the reſt as Traytors dyed for conſpiracy againſt her perſon, and breach of the Law in that caſe enacted for the indemnity of the State. To ſhrowd themſelues and their Diſciples from that danger of Law, at the ſuite of Campion Perſons, Haywood, and Hart, a diſpenſation was giuen to the Camelion Catholikes, from the rigorous extent of the foreſaid Bull: ſo that moſt of theſe Seminaries imploied for England, caſt off their Serpentine Skinnes, and ſhewed themſelues abroad in the attire of Gallants, the more ſafely to vent their enuenomed drugs, and to keepe their Coules from preaching at the Gallowes.

*to greater comfort, then the ſucceſſe that followed could maintaine. O pittifull change of things, the more need of peace within, to withſtand ſuch troubleſome perſecutions as you there haue ſuffered. I am not worthy to partake them: they are for more choſen veſſels. GOD grant you all there to know your owne bleſſing, and to thanke God of it. I had as much before my eyes long before, and ſtill thinke that wee ſhall haue no ſteady comfort but from GOD: a x A A, not o x. Therefore I beſeech you to take hold of the Pope, for the King of Spaine is as fearefull of warre, as a Childe of fire: and all his endeauours is to auoid all ſuch occaſions. * A will giue two thouſand, when you there ſhall be content with them. If they doe not ſerue to goe to England, at the leaſt they will ſerue to goe into Ireland. I thanke you heartily for the fauour you haue ſhewed to Gibbons brother, it ſeemeth to be a bleſſed brood, for Gods ſake continue your fauour ſtill that way, albeit I feare me your Seminary will againe fall to diſperſion. I haue none other thing in this world ſo at the heart, as to be with you: nor can I get leaue to depart hence. Therefore if it ſo fall that it bee no hinderance for you to come hither, loſe not the occaſion.* Vale in Chriſto Ieſu viſcera mea, ego te fruar in Domino, qui te in æternum tueatur. From Madrid the 6. of Nouember, 1577.

His imployment was to ſound the Hauens for entrance, and to collect a Catalogue of the names of ſuch great men in euery County of England, as ſtood for the Papall cauſe, vnto whom Charles Paget (masked vnder the names of Mope and Spring) was ioyned for an aſſiſtant. Sir Francis Englefield in the Low-Countries, and others elſewhere had vehemently ſollicited the King of Spaine to attempt Englands Inuaſion, and the Duke of Guize, vndertooke to be the principall leader, conditionally that Rome and Spaine would beare the charge of the warre.

(92) For compaſſing this plot, Throgmorton (for his part) had plotted a chard of the Hauens and Harbours of England, and gathered his Catalogue of Catholike aiders, which hee preſented vnto Mendoza. In this his Suruey no place was held fitter to land theſe forraine powers, then was Arundel in Suſſex, both for the neere cut from thoſe parts of France, where the Guize meant to muſter his men, as alſo for the opportunity of aſſured perſons, to giue them aſſiſtance, as they did preſume. The want was onely Money; for which, meſſengers were employed vnto Rome and to Spaine, whoſe returne was daily expected with bagges and Bils of Exchange, as they wiſhed and well hoped, which confidently was aſſured by Barnardine Mendoza, promiſing that the King his Maſter would beare halfe the charge of the enterprize.

For Throgmorton ſuddenly apprehended, and his Study ſearched, the Catalogue of Romanized Gentlemen of euery Shire, and the Hauens for landing of forraigne power, were therein found: with certaine Petigrees touching the title to the Engliſh Crowne, and ſome infamous libels publiſhed beyond Seas againſt her Maieſties Perſon. But a certaine Casket couered with greene veluet, was cunningly conueyed from vnder a bed, and carried to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, wherein many things lay hid, that neuer after came to light; as alſo a letter which himſelfe was then writing in Ciphers, hee conueyed from the ſight of the ſearchers: all which himſelfe confeſſed, and with his owne Pen wrote the whole Conſpiracy, for which, after iudgement he moſt worthily dyed.

(94) Not warned by theſe, William Parry (as hee named himſelfe) a man of a profuſe waſtfulneſſe, riot, and prodigality, hauing conſumed two Widdowes wealths, and wounded his Creditor, by committing Burglary, was for the fact condemned to die, but ſued and obtained his pardon of life by the compaſſioned mercy of Queene Elizabeth, which he, vngratefull man, ſought to requite, by vowing her death, that ſaued him from his. For trauelling into forraine parts, and there obtaining the title of a Ciuilian Doctor, he fell from his naturall alleagiance (as riotous Malecontents vſually doe) and reconciled himſelfe vnto the See of Rome, then hauing frequent acquaintance and conference with certaine Ieſuiticall Prieſts, was finally inſpired with a helliſh reſolution to kill her, who had giuen him life.

Two things were yet wanting, to ſtrike vp this Cataſtrophe, which were the Popes approbation, and his Abſolution from all his ſinnes: to procure which, Cardinall Como was imployed, who ſo effectually followed the buſineſſe, that both were ſhortly procured, and ſent him into England with a warrant to proceed in his Holineſſe Name.

For hauing priuate acceſſe to her preſence, was heard at large, that hee was the man who had vndertaken her death, which to ſound the deepe waters, and to beare ſayle with the faireſt, he promiſed to doe, with no intent, as he conſtantly affirmed, to act that impoſed charge, but onely to diſcouer thoſe who laid for her life. Her Highneſſe (whoſe piercing vnderſtanding was not eaſily blinded, or beguiled with words) ſeemed ſo doubtfully to interpret his confeſſed fact (which yet ſhee kept ſecret from her neereſt Counſellors) that he in great feare departed; as how can a conſcience ſo clogged, but feare? Whereupon his late letter from Como he ſhewed; which ſeeming alſo to be little eſteemed, and his ſuit to be M^r. of S^t. Katherines, vtterly reiected, confirmed more deſperatly his reſotion to kill her: and often hauing weapon, preſence, place, & oportunity, purpoſely thought to performe it, but euer was daunted when he beheld the glory of her preſence, and Maieſty in her face, wherein to his ſeeming, the Image of God, in her his Vicegerent, was portrayed, commanding him obedience, and threatning deſtruction to thoſe who intend violence againſt his holy Annointed.

violently deposed, in case of the religion of Rome) vpon these spurres hee posted to a worthy Gentleman, whom he supposed as discontented as himself, opening his Treasons for the bringing in of forreine inuaders, solliciting his assistance, and threatning with dagge or dagger to kill the Queene.

Parries Treason descried.

(98) The Gentlemen, loathing this horrible intent, reuealed the Treason vnto two principall Priuie Counsellers, and they vnto her Maiesty, who commited his examination vnto Sir Francis Walsingham her principall Secretarie, a man of exquisit iudgement, integrity and industry in all state affaires and intelligences; the Treasons then found out, and confessed by himself, were diuulged by his voluntarie pen, & subscribed vnto with his own hand, with many other circumstances vnknowne before, and againe were seconded by another letter, written to the Lords of the Counsell, which heere out of the Originall, I haue inserted.

Sir Francis Walsingh. the prime man of that age for intelligences of State.

Parries Treason confessed vnder his owne hand.

(99) My Lords, now that the conspiracy is discouered, the fault confessed, my conscience cleared, and minde prepared patiently to suffer paines due for so hainous a crime: I hope it shall not offend you, if crying, Miserere, with the poore Publicane, I leaue to despaire with cursed Caine. My case is rare, and strange, and for any thing I can remember singular: a naturall Subiect solemnly to vow the death of his naturall Queene, (so borne, so knowne, and so taken by all men) for the reliefe of the afflicted Catholike, and restitution of Religion. The matter first conceiued in Venice, the seruice (in general words) presented to the Pope, continued and vndertaken in Paris and lastly, commended and warranted by his Holinesse; digested and resolued in England, if it had not been preuented by accusation, or by her Maiesties greater lenity and more gratious vsage of her Catholike Subiects. This is my first and last offence conceiued against my Prince, or Countrey, and doth (I cannot deny) containe all other faults whatsoeuer. It is now to bee punished by death, or most graciously (beyond all common expectation) to be pardoned. Death I doe confesse to haue deserued: life I doe (with all humilitie) craue, if it may stand with the Queens Honour, and policie of the time. To leaue so great a Treason vnpunished, were strange; to draw it by my death, in example, were dangerous. A sworne seruant to take vpon him such an enterprize, vpon such a ground, and by such a warrant, hath not been seen in England. To indite him, arraigne him, bring him to the Scaffold, and to publish his offence, can doe no good. To hope that hee hath more to discouer then is confessed, or that at his execution he will vnsay any thing he hath written, is in vaine. To conclude, that it is impossible for him in time to make some part of amends, were very hard and against former experiences. The question then is, whether it be better to kill him, or (lest the matter bee mistaken) vpon hope of his amendment to pardon him. For mine owne opinion (though partiall) I will deliuer you my conscience. The case is good Queene Elizabeths; the offence is committed against her sacred person, and shee may (of her mercy) pardon it without preiudice to any. Then this I say in few words, as a man more desirous to discharge, his troubled conscience, then to liue. Pardon poore Parrie, and releeue him: for life without liuing is not fit for him. If this may not be, or be thought dangerous or dishonourable to the Queenes Maiesty (as by your fauours I thinke it full of honour and mercy) then I beseech your Lordships (and no other) once to heare me before I be endicted, and afterwards, if I must die, humbly to entreat the Queens Maiesty to hasten my triall and execution: which I pray God with all my heart, may proue as honourable to her; as I hope, it shall bee happy to me. Who will, while I liue (as I haue done alwaies) pray to Iesus Christ for her Maiesties long and prosperous raigne. From the Tower the 18. of February. 1584.

And to the end you may be so much the more holpen by that good spirit which hath moued you thereunto, his holinesse doth doth grant you plenary indulgence, and remission of all your sinnes, according to your request. Assuring you that besides the merit that you shall receiue therefore in heauen, his Holinesse will further make himselfe debtor to acknowledge and requite your deseruings, by all the best meanes he may. And that so much the more in that you vse the more modesty, in not pretending any thing. Put therefore to effect your holy and honorable determinations, and attend your health. (102) Had not then her Maiesty iust cause to complaine, as shee did? when in the honourable assembly of Parliament, shee openly professed, that shee knew no creature breathing, whose life stood hourely in more perill then her owne; and that euen at the first entrance into her estate, she entred into infinite dangers of life, as one that had to wrestle with many and mighty enemies. And yet, in confidence of her celestiall Protector, and of her owne innocency, she often seemed somewhat too remisse and neglectiue in the care of her selfe and life, as appeared manifestly by her procedings with this last Traitor, in keeping his conference of that importance, from the knowledge of her Counsellers, & often admitting priuately his accesse, though he had told her, he was the man appointed to worke her death. And indeed such was this Princesse Magnanimity, that in an apparant danger, as great, though not so traiterous as this, she shewed a resolution of courage farre aboue her sex, when being in her Barge vpon Thames to take the aire, accompanied with the French Ambassador, the Earle of Lincolne, and others, a Seruingman in the Court from his Caliuer discharged a Bullet, & shot the waterman, within fixe foote of her seat, (the second to her Bales) through both the armes; whereat all other being amazed, and the man abundantly bleeding, she threw him her scarfe, and with words of comfort bad him be of good cheer, he should not want, for the bullet was aimed at her, though it hit him; and with such resolute courage bare it out, as all present, admired. Neither so onely, but knowing afterwards that it was done casually at randome, she both pardoned the party of his life, when he was to die, and commanded his Master to retaine him againe into his seruice.

The Treason laid against him (besides the former of the insurrection in the North, by himselfe confessed, and by the Court fined at fiue thousand Markes) was, that he had beene priuy to the Plots of Throgmorton, for the bringing in of Forreine powers, to the destruction of the Queen and Realme; which truth being reuealed by other conspirators, he so deepely apprehended, as in that desperate manner hee preuented his further iudgement.

But being intercepted before he well wist, hee was committed to Custody, yet so as hee went abroad with his Keeper, from whom he shortly made his escape: and thinking to recouer the Seas, disguised himselfe like a Labouring man, staining with wallnut-tree laeues his hands and face, which shadowed neither his shame nor sinne, neither yet could hide him from the eye that called him to account; for being descried and brought backe to London, he was with curses of the people committed to the Tower, whence he could not so easily start.

(111) The other conspirators, hearing of these their confederates successe, dispersed themselues & plaied least in sight, yet were they found out, indited and brought to their trials, all of them confessing their Treasons without any torture. Yet at their arraignement (perswading themselues belike, that what they did by papall warrant, could not be called Treason,) they pleaded not guilty, which the Iury vpon manifest proofes finding otherwise, they worthily receiued iudgement of death, and died accordingly in Lincolnes Inne fields, euen in the place where they had often conferred for the execution of their Treasons.

(116) Whereupon Ferrara of better repute with the King, receiued bils of exchange for the money, deliuered by the Counte Fuentes, and from the said Counte, Manuell Lewis another Portugall, was presently sent into England to conferre with Ferrara, and they both with Lopez, who faithfully promised vpon the payment of the money to performe the villany. At which very instant Gods mercy did bring to light the conspiracy, through the continual vigilancy of some Lords of the Counsell, in which number neuer any Prince had more, Sapient, Sedulous, Prouident, and experienced Sages, then shee had.

Lopez put to triall.

(117) And to make experiment of his intendments, Lopez was appointed to giue the Queen Physicke; who made ready the potion, and brought it to her presence. But her Maiesty knowing what hee least suspected, told him, hee must goe minister to the Lord Treasurer, Cicill, who at that present had more need of Physicke then her selfe; whereupon Lopez with double diligence repaired vnto him, signifying his comming was to minister his Lordship Physicke, so commanded him by the Queene: yea marry said the old man but what is your Physicke? a purge and it please your honor said Lopez: a purge Master Doctor said the L. Treasurer, I thinke I must become a Physitian to Purge you, and thereupon he apprehended him for a Traitor, who stood so perplexed with feare, that his presence was scarce tollerable for the smell. Then other Doctors of Physicke were called, for to examine the ingredients, who easily found that the potion was poison, for which hee was indicted and arraigned at Barre, where hee pleaded not guilty, and his two Consorts by long circumstances sought to saue their liues, yet their former confessions subscribed with their own hands, gaue sufficient testimony of their guilts; for which at Tyburne vpon the seuenth of Iune they suffered death.

Lopez apprehended of treason.

Febru. 28.

(118) Stephano Ibarra thus failing of his purpose, by these Portugall fals, sought yet to raise the fabricke of his wicked intents, vpon the resolutions of some English fugitiues; among whom none were held more fit then Edmund Yorke, and Richard Williams, souldiers by profession, and two desperate Champions for the quarrell of Rome; vnto whom Hugh Owen an English Rebell, & Spanish Pensioner, shewed an assignation, vnder that Secretaries hand, of foure thousand Crownes to bee giuen them for to murder their Queen; and for assurance that the same should be forth comming, the assignation was deliuered in Deposito, to Holt an English Iesuite, who producing the Sacrament, and kissing it, tooke solemne Oath to pay the mony as soone as the fact was done.

Yorke and Williams Treason.

Owen.

(119) To forward this enterprize, three seuerall consultations were held at Bruxels, wherein Holt sate as President, and William Stanley Protector for this diuelliish designe, animating Yorke by his vncles example, to be constantly resolued, as a man ordained for his Countries good, and though many had miscarried in attempting the Act, yet that it was meritorious and easie to be done. Thomas Throgmorton, Michaell Moody, Charles Paget, Henry Owen, Edmund Garret, and the two diuine Doctors, Gifford and Worthington, were principall speakers in this impious Parliament, all of them eager to egge on the two vndertakers, & to ioyne to them a third man, named Young, whose taske should be to kill the greatest Counsellors, as soone as the Queene should be dead. The last that spake was Holt the President, who after he had ministred these Traitors their Oathes, in threatning wise, menaced to take from the English this high and acceptable seruice, and to employ therein Strangers, who were farre more worthy: and so sent the two former into England with his blessing, which neuertheless could not saue them from the Gallowes: their purposes were to get entertainement of some great Courtier, the better to effect what they intended, and to seeme men of some note for intelligence, sent from Callis to procure their passport, but the vigilant eye of the English State had found out their treasons before (and bringing them afterwards to their trials, they were found guilty, iudged, and died like traitors.

Consulters about furthering the Treason.

Young.

(120) The last publike attempter, that assaied the Queenes death, was Edward Squire, a Scriuener of Greenewich, who by deputation had emploiment of a purueyer in the Stable, but being in witte aboue his vocation, and carrying his sailes aboue his fortunes; put himselfe in action for Sea in the last voyage that Sir Francis Drake made into the Indies. Embarked he was in a small shippe, called the Frances, who losing the Fleete about Guadalupe, was taken by fiue Spanish Frigots, and with other brought Prisoners into Spaine: where falling in acquaintance with Richard Walpoole an English fugitiue, by order a Iesuite, in great credite, and vicar Generall to Parsons in in his abſence, was by him obſerued to bee of more capacity then commonly was found in a man of his quality or education; for yeeres, mature, and paſſed his middle age; for carriage well aduiſed, and reſolute enough, if not too much, in not apprehending his eminent danger.

Squier a fit ſubiect to worke vpon.

(121) Vpon him Walpoole therefore meant to worke, conceiuing for his purpoſe two ſpeciall aduantages: the one, that comming into Spaine a Priſoner, and not a fugitiue, his returne into England would be without ſuſpect; the other, that Squire had been employed in the Queenes ſtable, and therefore had liberty of free acceſſe: But the more to inuolue what hee intended, hee ſubtilly cauſed Squier to be apprehended by the Inquiſition, and put priſoner into the holy Houſe: where mollified by diſtreſſe, hee got his heart into his hands, ſo that of a Neuter he became a fixed Romaniſt.

(122) This firſt aſſay prooued effectuall, for an introduction to his further intendments, he fell into the old ſong; whoſe burden was the tyrannies vſed, and the perſecutions exerciſed in England againſt the poore Catholikes; vpon how few perſons the Engliſh State did ſtand, and how eaſily thoſe props were to be remooued, if any deuored would put to their hands. Squier who wanted no wit to perceiue whereat he aymed; firſt, gaue ſome ſlight ſignification, and after a more ſerious proteſtation, that he was the man, that would ſacrifice himſelfe and his ſeruice in the cauſe.

Walpoole proiects the killing of the Earle of Eſſex.

(123) The good Father hauing thus got him into the circle, began then the charme: It were (ſaid he) no doubt a worke meritorious to kill the Earle of Eſſex; but vnum neceſſarium, one thing is neceſſary: And then told him plainely, that he meant to put a ſeruice vpon him of great worth, and reward; which he might accompliſh without any euident perill of life, becauſe it was to bee done not immediately vpon her perſon, nor in her preſence, neither yet in doing it (though hee were ſeen) ſhould bee endangered, being acted as hee would preſcribe; and that was to impoyſon the pommell of the Queenes ſaddle, at ſuch time as ſhee ſhould ride abrode, the Pommell being the place, whereon ſhee would reſt her hand, and her hand not vnlikely to touch her mouth or noſtrils, would giue acceſſe to the forcible poiſon. This, ſaid he, might eaſily be performed, he hauing familiar acquaintance in the Quirry, yea and that very ſafely; but if otherwiſe, and immediate death happened, he ſhould be aſſured, that for the exchange of this preſent and tranſitory life, to enioy the ſtate of a glorious Saint in heauen.

He teacheth how to poyſon the Queens Saddle.

Walpoles helliſh conſultations.

(124) Which Syrens ſong ended, and Squier inueigled; confeſſions, vowes, promiſes, receit of the Sacrament, and all confirmed the reſolution of the diuelliſh attempt; and to preuent varying from this Center, Walpoole told him, that now hee ſtood in the ſtate of damnation, if hee did not his vttermoſt endeauour to performe his vow, bidding him remember, how that the ſinne of backſliding did ſeldome obtaine pardon; and if he did but once make doubt of the lawfulneſſe or merit of the act, it was enough to caſt him head-long downe into hell; and if he did conceiue any difficulties, he wiſhed him to conſider what it auailed a man, to win the whole world, and to looſe his owne ſoule.

His ghoſtly Counſels.

(125) Squier thus armed (though not with the complete Armour of the Apoſtle) fell downe in confeſſion before this Ieſuites feet; whom hee lifted vp, hugd him about the necke with his left arme (ſuch were Squiers owne words) and croſſing him with his other hand, mumbled a few words in Latine, and then diſtinctly in Engliſh ſpake thus; God bleſſe thee, and giue thee ſtrength my ſonne; bee of good courage, I pawne my ſoule for thine, and thou ſhalt haue my prayers dead and aliue. Thereupon deliuering vnto him the poyſon, directed how it ſhould be vſed; and ſhewed him the nature of the confection; which was, to bee put into a double bladder, and when it was to bee employed, to bee pricked full of holes, and ſo preſſed out vpon the Pommell of the Queenes ſaddle; the operation whereof was ſuch, that vpon his hand hee muſt haue a thicke double gloue, leaſt the poyſon thereof ſhould infect himſelf, whoſe vigour alſo was ſuch, as neither continuance of time; nor ſubtilty of ayre could checke or vn-vertuate the ſtrength: And that the matter might bee carried without all ſuſpect, an exchange was accepted of two Spaniſh priſoners in England, for Rowles and Squier to be releaſed from Spaine.

Squiers arriuing in England.

(126) Thus himſelfe poyſoned in heart, and minding to poyſon others, being monied by the Ieſuite, arriued in England, not long before the expedition for Cadiz; which action (as hee thought) fitted him well, and thereupon made ſuite and obtained it, to attend the Earle of Eſſex in his owne ſhip; aſwell to be abſent when the poyſon ſhould worke on her Maieſty (which he meant to beſtow before his departure) as to haue opportunity thereby, to poyſon the Earle himſelfe. Occaſion being giuen by the Queenes riding abroad, and her Horſe made ready, and attending in the Stable-yard, thither Squier repaired full of euill ſpirits; and laying his hand vpon the Pommell of her Saddle, bruiſed out the poyſon in the bladder ſaying cheerfully, God ſaue the Queen; with no better affection then Ioab bare to Amaſa, when with his hand he tooke him to kiſſe him, but with his ſword ſtruck him to the heart. His part thus plaid, Gods wonted and wonderfull protection beganne, who vnder his Canopy or wings of mercy had euer ſhadowed her from the ſtroke of danger, for albeit the * ſeaſon was hot, and the veines open to receiue any maligne tainture, yet her body felt no diſtemperature, nor her hand felt no more hurt, then Pauls did, when hee ſhooke of the Viper into the fire.

Act. 25. 1.

(127) The deed thus done, without all miſtruſt, Squier taking the remaine of the poyſon, within ſixe daies after departed to the Sea, and had his entertainment in the Earle of Eſſex his owne Ship, where ſeeking to finiſh his diuelliſh deſigne betwixt Faial and Saint Michaels, beſtowed his confection vpon the Pommels of a wodden chaire, wherein the Earle vſually ſate at meales: which in like manner (the Lord ſo working) tooke not effect, to the no little admiration of Squier, though very well ſatisfied, that the default was not his, but rather in the poyſon it ſelfe; and his vow now diſcharged (as he thought) he ſlept the more quiet.

Squiers endeuour to poyſon the Earle of Eſſex. going to Cadiz.

(128) Walpoole the Ieſuite ouer-tickled with ioye of his hoped ſucceſſe, and not able longer to keepe ſecrecy, imparted his treaſons to his companions in Spaine, who together with him daily expected the iſſue thereof, but all things ſilent, and no newes of the Cataſtrophe, they changed their opinions, and held Squier for a falſ-brother, when as alſo their longing hearts beganne to feare, leſt the maine cauſe would bee mard, being caſt into ſo bad a mould. Whereupon a conſultation was called, and the Sicophant condemned in the higheſt degree, whoſe end muſt be ſpeedily wrought, or elſe thoſe Catholike proceedings would ſurely come to wracke; for that he knowing much, would (as was feared) reueale much more; and therefore it was politikely concluded, that one ſhould be let ſlip from them into England, to giue information of Squiers treaſons.

Squire miſtruſted to be a falſe brother.

(129) This man to haue the more credit, brought two letters in his budget, the one he affirmed, himſelf had ſtolne out of a Ieſuits ſtudy, & the other brought from another perſon, both which indeed were found to bee counterfeit, and Squier for the preſent reputed an honeſt man. Yet becauſe the matter was tender, and touched neer the quicke, Squier was ſent for, and examined; at firſt hee denies all, but comming to circumſtances; ſomething was found, hold taken, and the Traitor committed to Priſon; who left alone, beganne to bethinke him how farre his Confeſſors Confeſſion might extend, and therefore by good Counſell (the truth withall working) he he disclosed the Treason, and how far he had therein gone, which indeed no man had knowledge of but himselfe, and this confessed at the Tower, without torture, and at the Barre with remorse of conscience, he had his sentence of death, which he accordingly suffered.

The iust motiue to the State to make sharp lawes to preuent Treasons.

(130) Had not then the wise Statists of the Land, cause to enact such Lawes as they did; to set the shaking Sword in the entrance of this faire Eden, and to stop out the wilde Boare that would lay the Vineyard waste? their Queene and lamp of Glory, hauing thus often and narrowly escaped extinguishing, by as many hands of murthering Priests and Iesuites, as Dauid had pursuers of his life, when to Ionathan hee complained, that there was but a step betwixt him and death? So that iustly in a conference of Parliament, for meanes to be had against the many conspirators, daily leuelling at her royall heart, one of good repute, hauing experience of their desperate designes, in the open Assembly, with a feeling affection, thus vttered his minde: that euery night when hee awaked, he feared to heare some newes of desperate mischiefe, and protested before God, he neuer saw the light of the day, but that he feared before the Sun-set, to heare of some strange attempt.

1 Sam 20.3.

So many and so continually were the conspiracies.

(131) For as the Pope had denounced vnder his Buls, an absolution to him that would dethroane Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene: so were there many foule minded Proselites, that reputed her bloud as an acceptable sacrifice, which many times they sought to offer vnto their God: but hers and our God, the watchman of Israel, neither slumbred nor slept in protecting her Person, as the apple of his eye; whose iust defence, her innocency, and their bloudy guilts, haue often divulged to the whole world; neuer any Prince escaping so many dangers, as this most milde and maiden Queene in her daies had done, and many more no doubt were put in practice, which lay groueling in darkenesse, and neuer came to light, and as the workes of darkenesse, so let them lie, and let vs hasten to our former, and farre more pleasing Subiect. Hauing therefore from the yeere 1570. made our digression, for the closer relation of all those treacheries together; let vs thence pursue the ensuing occurrents of her raigne and life.

Many more conspiracies then euer came to light

(132) In Anno 1571. and thirteenth of her most happy Raigne, that the State might be stayed vpon an approued succession, a Parliament was called, and therein thus was enacted: For the auoiding of contentions, and seditions spreading abroad titles to the succession of the Crowne of this Realme, to the disturbing of the quiet of the Realme: Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that whosoeuer shall hereafter, during the life of our said Soueraigne Lady, by any Booke, or worke printed or written, directly and expresly declare, and affirme at any time before the same be by Act of Parliament of this Realme established and affirmed, that any one particular person, whosoeuer it be, is, or ought to be the right Heire and successor to the Queenes Maiesty that now is, (whom God long preserue) except the same be the naturall issue of her body: or shall wilfully set vp in open place, publish, or spread any Bookes or Scrowles to that effect; or shall print, binde, or put to sale, or vtter any such Booke, or writing wittingly: that he, or they, their Abettors and Counsellors, and euery of them, shall for the first offence suffer imprisonment of one whole yeere, and forfeit halfe his goods, whereof the one moity to the Queenes Maiestie, the other moity to him or them that will sue for the same, by bill, action of debt, plaint, information, or otherwise, in any of the Queenes Maiesties Courts, wherein no essoyne or protection shall be allowed: And if any shall eftsoones offend therein, then they, and euery of them, their Abettors, and Counsellors shall incurre the paines and forfeitures which in the Statutes of prouision, or premunire are appointed and limitted.

Parl. iin An. 13. Eliz. Reg. April 2.

(133) Notwithstanding, these sharp threats, and seeming set edge against such offenders, and disturbers of State, yet was the prosecution thereof executed with a more soft temper: for not any one person (resting there onely without further attempts) felt the weight of that imposed fine: so milde was the disposition of this Mayden Queene, and so inclined to mercy; though necessity required more strict Iustice in those rebellious and papall times.

(134) But that Pen of Sanders which enuiously hath written, and those Romanists that suspiciously hath glozed vpon the words of that Parliament, the Naturall Issue of her Body, as intended for an vnlawfull Bed, let be accursed, and them accounted for shamelesse Recorders of State passages, who oprobriously seeke and search into the thoughts of farre better Subiects; and by their selfe-wicked imaginations, doe blot the faire proceedings of that Honourable Assembly, and as much as in them is, defame the vertues of that Virgin Queene: whose chaste remembrance among her many other Princely parts, is celebrated through the whole World, and euer shall be.

(135) But she being the Maule that beate down their Dagon, and the Lyon that met their crooked Serpent in his way, those Wizards teeth were set on edge with vntruths, and their tongues as sharpe Razors whetted vnto slander: for which let themselues expect, and we attend what reward shall be giuen vnto such false tongues.

(136) Nor was Scotland free frō their trecherous attempts, when at the same time their Regent was slaine by the shot of an Harquebuse, as hee rode through Lithquo, mistrusting no danger. And a roade made into England in time of peace, by some discontented Scotish, who carryed great booties with them into Scotland: to recouer which, Sussex the Earle Generall, and Lord Hunsdon, Gouernour of Barwicke followed, and in Tinidale did much hurt to the Inhabitants.

(137) New troubles thus arising, as wel for the death of the Regent, as for the vnder propping of the then falling Pinacles of the Church of Rome, the Land full of factions, and all in ciuill broyles, the Englisn Queenes aide was sent for, by some of the Lords, who with their helpes, preuailed in winning and demolishing many strong and faire Castles. And the Earle of Lennox sent into Scotland by her Maiesty, was first made Lord Gouernour, and after Lord Regent, by the election of their three Estates, who afterwards was as trayterously murthered, as the other before him had beene, which caused great troubles in Scotland; yea, and some Nobles of England were not exempted from the same.

(138) For Lord Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, intending some fauours for the Scotish cause, proceeded so farre therein, as the letter of the Law took aduantage of his life, to the great sorrow and laments of very many. For being a man filled with fauour, both of his Prince, and of the People, Fortune at length made him a Ball for her banding; who first from Burnam besides Windsore was brought to Westminster, and thence by water was left Prisoner in the Tower, where he remained from the eleuenth of October, vnto the fourth of August following, and then was remoued to the Charter-House neere Smithfield, where he abode thirteene moneths space; till lastly he was sent backe againe into the Tower, where, vpon the Hill and ordinary Scaffold, he penitently suffered death.

(139) In this yeer of Christs natiuity, 1572. the eighteenth of Nouember, appeared a strange Starre or Comet Northward, in the Constellation of Cassiopeia, euen at the backe of her Chayre; which with three chiefe fixed Starres of the said Constellation, made a Geometricall figure losing-wise. This Starre in bignesse at the first appearing, seemed bigger then Iupiter, and not much lesse then Venus, when shee seemeth greatest. It neuer changed place, but was carried about with the daily motion of the Heauens, as all fixed Starres commonly are; and was obserued by the greatest Mathematicians to haue been in place celestiall farre aboue the Moone, otherwise then euer any Comet hath been ſeen, or naturally can appeare, nor the like from the beginning of the World did euer appeare, vnleſſe it were that which at Chriſts Natiuity was ſeen, vnto which Starre indeed Philip of Mornay, Lord of Pleſſie, doth compare it. Tru. Chriſt. Relig. Chap. 34.

Duell or combat for title of Lands.

(140) About which time, a ſtrange caſe (which we will inſert, rather to ſhew the courſe of Iuſtice and mercy of the Queene, then for any other great vſe in Story) happened at the Common-Law Barre: where Simon Lowe, and John Kyme were Plaintifes, for a certaine Manor and demaines in the Iſle of Harty, adioyning to that of Sheppey in Kent, wrongfully poſſeſt (as they alleaged) by Thomas Paramour, againſt whom they brought a Writ of right: the Defendant offered to maintaine his Title by Combate, which the Plaintifes accepted, and brought their Champions before the Iudges to the Barre. For Paramour was George Thorne, of a bigge and broad ſet, who caſt downe his Gauntlet as Challenger, to iuſtifie Paramours right, which was taken vp by Henry Naylor Maſter of Defence, a man proper and ſlender, and not very tall, who appeared for Lowe and Kyme, to make good their claime.

The two Champions.

The place of Combat.

(141) The place appointed for Combate, was in Tuttle-fields, where a Plot of ground of one and twenty yards ſquare, was doubly rayled, and without the Weſt-ſquare a Stage ſet for the Iudges, repreſenting the Court of Common Pleas, behind the which two Tents were pitched, the one for Thorne, and the other for Naylor, the field with Scaffolds on euery ſide for People to ſee: All things thus ready, and the day drawing on, her Maieſty (who euer abhorred all bloud-ſhed) tooke the matter into her owne hands, and gaue command and directions for the Parties agreement, with a ſurceaſe from all further ſuite, which could not wel be, vnleſſe the Champions appeared in field; who altogether ignorant of what was determined, vpon the day aſſigned appeared in place, Thorne was there firſt, who was brought to his Tent by Sir Ierome Bowes; then came Naylor, hauing the Gauntlet borne before him vpon a Swords point, a Truncheon (Taper-wiſe) typt with horne, about an elle long, and a ſhield of hard leather carryed after him; and ſo was conueyed to his Tent by Sir Henry Cheiney.

(142) The Court ſet, and the Combatters called, Naylor entred the lyſts, being led by the hand by Sir Ierome Bowes, where making his obeyſance, he came to the Barre, and there held vp his Shield. Then was Thorne brought into the lyſts by Sir Henry Cheiney, and with like reuerence he held vp his Shield. Whereupon an Oath was miniſtred to the approuer, the Tenor whereof hee ſpake as followeth. Heare this, you Iudges, that I haue this day neither eate, drunke, nor haue vpon me either bone, ſtone, ne graſſe, or any enchantment, ſorcery, or witch-craft, where through the power of the Word of God might be inleaſed or diminiſhed, and the Diuels power increaſed: and that my appeale is true, ſo helpe me God, and his Saints, and by this Booke.

The oath miniſtred to the Challenger.

(143) Then was Proclamation made in her Maieſties Name, that no Perſon of whatſoeuer eſtate, degree, or condition there preſent, be ſo hardy to giue any token or ſigne, by countenance, ſpeech, or language, either to the Prouer, or to the Defender, whereby the one of them may take aduantage of the other, and no perſon to remoue, but keepe ſtill his place: and euery perſon to keepe their ſtaues and their weapons to themſelues; and ſuffer neither the ſaid Prouer, nor Defender to take any of their weapons, or any other thing that may ſtand either to the ſaid Prouer or Defender any auaile, vpon payne of forfeiture of Lands, Tenements, Goods, Chattels, and impriſonment of their bodies, and making fine and ranſome at the Queenes pleaſure. But when all theſe Ceremonies were ended, the Lord Chiefe Iuſtice ſtood vp, and forbad the proceedings, alotting Paramour the Lands, with the ſatisfying of the Plaintifes, and thereupon commanded Naylor to giue Thorne againe his Gauntlet, which he vnwillingly did; and ſo the Combate being ended, we may haue leaue to proceed.

(144) Peace flouriſhing in England, to no great liking of the Seminary, that often ſought to diſturbe it: the Regent of Scotland craued aide of her Maieſtie, for the defence of the young King, and the Countrey, endangered at that time with ciuill broyles. Shee as tender in her affection, as he dutifull in his alleageance, ſent him fifteene hundred men, whereof Sir william Drury, Knight Marſhall of Berwicke, was Generall. Theſe comming to Edenborough, lay battery to the Caſtle, with no leſſe then thirty Canons, and were as valiantly reſiſted by the Scotiſh within, but for want of freſh water, and no aide to be expected, the Souldiers ſicke, hurt, ouer-wearyed, and diuided in opinion, Lord Peteroe being let downe from the wall, by compoſition the Caſtle was ſurrendered, to the vſe of the young King, whereupon the Engliſh returned to Berwicke.

This place for the glory of England, he named Noua Albion according to her ancient name; and at his departure areared a Monument to witnesse what there had beene done, which was a plate, of brasse fixed in an eminent place, wherein was engrauen her Maiesties name, and her right that prouince, as freely giuen vnto her deputy both by King and people. Wherein also was written the yeere and day of their entrance, and of the lands deliuerance; vnder which plate hee put her Maiesties picture and armes in a peece of Siluer to retein the memory of this seruice vnto posterity. From thence the fourteenth of November he fell with Ternate one of the Iles of Moluco, being curteously entertained of the King, and from thence he came vnto the Iles of Celebees, to Iaua Maior, to the Cape Buona Speranze, and fell with the Coasts of Guinea, whence crossing againe the line, he came to the height of the Azores, and thence into England vpon the third of Nouember and yeere of Saluation 1580, after hee had beene at Sea with such fortunate successe the space of three yeeres lacking twelue daies. The small vessell wherein this admirable voyage was performed, was at her Maiesties commandement, laid vp in the docke besides Deepeford, where it remaineth as a monument of Englands great fame, vnto this day; and the worthy Generall honoured with knighthood, being the first that by trauell encompassed the Earth, and saw the wonderous workes of God in those great deepes.

The Sultan Muraht his Letters to her Maiestie.

(150) Most glorious, and in brightnesse most splendent woman, and of women the chiefest Prince of the mighty followers of Iesus. Queene of the most famous Kingdome of England, most excellent Elizabeth, most sapient Gouernesse of all the affaires of thy People, and Family of the Nazarites, the most pleasant Spring of brightnesse and glory, the most acceptable Cloude sweete showers, the Heire and Lady of perpetuall happinesse, and blessednesse, of the most famous Kingdome of England, to whom all distressed suters doe flocke for reliefe. Wee wishing from GOD the mighty Creator, a most fortunate increase of all the affaires of your Excellency, and happy successe; and offering eternall vowes and prayses worthy of our mutuall and perpetuall familiarity and league, and declaring the premisses, and that which followeth with singular decentnesse: Wee giue you to vnderstand most friendly, that certaine yeeres passed, we had continuall warres with Casulbas, Prince of Persia, in right of our People, by reason whereof wee would not make warre vpon other parts, whereby certaine theeues in the parts of Polonia, called Casakes, and other wicked persons lurking in those confines, daily troubled and grieued our Subiects: now the Persian being vanquished, and by the power of the Almighty Creator, matters in those parts being compounded, wee determined to punish the said persons lurking in Poland, and other parts; and by the Belgerby of Greece our Army being ioyned, and sent with our charge by a Prince of Tartaria, in the yeere last passed, a part of the Kingdome of Polonia, was on our behalfe troubled, and wasted, and the said Casakes, and other wicked persons were punished accordingly to their deserts, which the King of Poland seeing, and sending two messengers to our blessed Port, to inquire, finde out, and punish in full punishment, signified so much vnto vs, and required our acceptations of his present; but we would not allow his Petition, but had fully determined againe to send our Army against the said King of Poland; but the Ambassador of your Maiesty remaining in our blessed Port, interposing himselfe, and signifying that he did assist your Excellency with Corne, Gun-powder, Masts, and other things, necessary for warre, out of the confines of Polonia; now when as the Kingdome of Polonia by our meanes was troubled, and your Ambassador declared vnto vs your singular and peculiar pleasure, the same his declaration and intercession was vnto vs gratefull and acceptable, and your Excellency to whom we owe all fauours and honour. We wrote our Letters to the King of Polonia on this manner; that the said factious wicked persons and Casakes should bee found out and fully punished, but if on the behalfe of your Maiesty, a louing league of peace had not been sollicited for the King of Poland, wee would not by any meanes haue entred League with him, but onely at your request we haue shewed this grace to the said King and his Subiects, and sith our familiarity is mutuall and perpetuall, we thinke it conuenient that your Maiesty ioyning your selfe with the Kingdome of Polonia, doe not leaue to continue warre with the King of Spaine, who so long time hath kept warre against you; and if your Maiesty bee not grieued to write vnto vs by some trusty man, we vow, by the aide of the Omnipotent Creator, that all necessary things shall be on our part finished and ordered, that a speedy dispatch may be made into Spaine, *wherein for our parts no assistance shall be wanting, whereof you may nothing doubt. But from these farre trauels, long and chargeable aduentures, let vs returne to our neerer home proceedings, vnder the Gouernment of our prudent Queene Sheba.

(151) Gregory, of that name the thirteenth, and stout stirring man of Rome: seeing Pope Pius his thunderbolts fall short of the marke whereunto they were aimed, thought it necessary to raise that begun foundation, (though with ill burnt bricke, and bad tempred morter) as that his mounted Canons from the height, might reach and command where the other had left: To which purpose hee sollicited Philip King of Spaine, after his fortunes had set him in Portugall Anno 1582. to vndertake warre against Queene Elizabeth either directly or vnderhand, infauour of the Irish Rebels, vnto which charge he offered not only his holy blessing, and spiritual treasure, but also to acquit him of the fruits of the Archbishopricke of Toledo, long retained in his hands, whilst the Archbishop remained suspended, and the King receiued some millions of Crowns, which the Pope claimed to belong vnto the See of Rome. But Philip not yet ready to attempt vpon England, ioyned with him for the conquest of Ireland; the one sending sixe hundred men vnder the command of Thomas Stukely, whom he had lately stiled Marquesse of Ireland,) a profuse and defamed person throughout all Christendome, flying out of England for his many Piracies, and now imploied to follow the consecrated Standard of the Church;) the other, bearing all the charge, with an adition of three hundred Spaniards, sending money with them to wage foure thousand men more; and the more to kindle the flames of Rebellions, Doctor Sanders (the Arch-Rebel and English Fugitiue) was sent from the Popes holy side.

the Country should shortly know wherefore they were come: and Desmond, a man desperate to euill, put in action by papall authority, had laid his hopes no lower (by these aides now arriued) then presently to become the sole King of Ireland, as Benhadad boasted ouer Israel before his harnesse was put on.

1. King. 20.11.

(153) To salute this puppet King, and to welcome these papals with such entertainement as his martiall sword would allow, Arthur Lord Grey Baron of Wilton, then Deputy of Ireland, hasted to Dingle, and so to Del-Ore, where he bad them to so sharpe a banquet, that all the Spaniards, Italians, and Biscayes, notwithstanding their bragging brauadoes yelded their weapons at the first brunt, and vpon the points of the aduersaries, died without mercy; the Captaines Coronell, Secretary and few more reserued for ransome. The Fort they had stored with money, Bisket, Bacon, Oile and wine, sufficient to hold out the space of sixe moneths, and furnished with powder, shot, and armour sufficiently for two thousand men: with them all the Irish as well women as men died; and Desmond driuen into extreame want, fearing the pricke of euery thorne, & the shadow of euery bush, notwithstanding he was armed with an Agnus Dei, and an enchanted ring sent from the Popes owne finger hung about his necke, yet could he not keepe his traiterous head vpon his shoulders; when like a wolfe wandering in the woods for his prey, was in a poore Cottage wonded by a Souldier rushing in vpon him, and being knowne was presently cut shorter by the head. But with his end, ended not the troubles of Ireland, especially those parts of Vlster, that lay most remote from England.

An. D. 1573. Walter Earle of Effex, in Ireland.

(154) And whereunto, Walter Earle of Essex, accompanied with the Lord Rich, and others, had formerly made an expedition, aswell to reduce those wilde Irish vnto a more ciuil life and respectiue obedience vnto the English Crowne, as to winne them to the knowledge of Christ, whom they most ignorantly worshipped. But the death of this Nobleman hapning before his intendments could bee accomplished, left that to be followed by others which himselfe had begun.

(155) The troubles of which Prouince we haue partly touched vnto the death of Shan O-Neale, whose segnories by Parliament were inuested into the queenes hands, and a Law enacted, that from thence forth no man should assume the name or title of O-Neale. After which some small blasts of peace breathed vpon those parts; till shortly Turlogh Leinigh, a brothers son of Con-More the Grandfather of this Shan, by a popular election tooke that stile vpon him, a man stept farre in yeeres, which made him more quiet, and much the rather for feare of Shan O-Neales sonnes, but especially of Hugh Baron of Dungannon the sonne of bastard Mathew, vnto whom he had giuen his daughter in Marriage, and the said Baron had lately repudiated and cast off.

T e name or ti- e forbidden.

(156) This Turlogh was most obsequious and seruiceable to Queene Elizabeth, stirring no troubles to the English, though to his neighbours the Irish he proued most sterne: For, O-Donell hee disquieted, the Scots of the Islands he molested, and in an incounter slew Alexander Oge the slayer of Shan O-Neale; and indeed became so fearefull, that his sonne in law Hugh, lay hid from him in his owne Country, and lastly escaped his hands into England, where to raise himselfe from his obscure estate and condition, hee got command of a troupe of Horse, with a pension of a thousand markes by yeere from the Queene. Whose seruice against the Rebellious Desmond, was so well performed and accepted, that he obtained the place and title of Earle of Tir-Oen, pleading the Letters patent of King Henry the eight, granted to his Grand-father, and his heires males, whereof himselfe was the sonne of Mathew, created Baron of Dungannon by the same King. Thus growne vnto greatnesse, old Turlogh vpon certaine conditions resigned vnto him the Gouernment of Vlster, where shortly cõbining himselfe with the men of most might, they together associated their strẽgths to defend the Romish religion, for that was the mantle that euer couered their hatched rebellions.

Turlogh a tyrant against his neighbours.

Baron Dungannon got imployments of the Queene.

He is made Earle of Tir-Oen

(157) The first Champion that sounded the Alarum was Mac-Guyre a man of a turbulent spirit, thrust forward by Guaran a Priest, whom Pope Vrbane the second had ordained Primate of Ireland, commanding him in the name of God to fight there the Lords Battaile; assuring him by his Apostolicall warrant, of most fortunate proceedings and happy successe. But see how this great Prophet was deceiued; for by the valour of S^r. Richard Bingham, Mac-Guyre was discomfited, and the primate Priest slaine in the field.

Mac Guyre.

Guaran bought his primacy at a deere rate

(158) The Confederacy thus broken, Mac-Guyre set himselfe for open rebellion; whome Tir-Oen in shew of his dutifull obedience pursueth, and was so forward in seruice; that he receiued a wound in his thigh to his no little honour. Whereupon he became of greater respect in the Englisb Court, and more enhaunsed in his owne esteeme; so that hee feared not to exhibite Complaints against the Lord Deputy S^r. William Fitz-Williams, the Marshall, whose sister he e had married, and the Garrisons souldiers that Guarded those parts. But the Deputy recalled, and S^r. William Russel appointed in his place; as if all quarrels had beene quite forgotten, he came vnto the new Lord Deputy, and exhibited an humble submission vpon his knees, wherein hee dolefully expressed his inward griefe, in that her Maiesty had conceiued some indignatiõ against him His absenting himselfe from the State, he confessed was disagreable to his obedience, albeit to be somewhat excused by the hard measure (as he alleaged) of the late Deputy, and Marshall, that were combined for his destruction. He acknowledged that the Queenes Maiesty had aduanced him in title, dignity and great liuings, and himselfe vnworthy of any, but rather dishonour and ruine, if he should become vngratefull vnto so good a Prince. With these and the like complement of his true heart and meaning, hee possest the Counsell of Ireland, that albeit S^r. Henry Bagnall the Marshall was present, and charged him with many subornations of Mac-Guyre, the Primate, the besiege of Inis-Kellin and others, hee was by them dismissed and sent home, to the great discontent of the Queene and disquietnesse of the Land, as afterward followed, and in course of time and story shall be declared.

Tir-Oens good seruice against Mac-Guyre.

Tir-Oen grows very bold.

Sir. W. Russel L. Deputy.

Tir-Oens Dissimulations.

(159) Long before these last Irish troubles, (as you may obserue in the relation of some former attempts against the Queene) the brands of dissention were blowne vnto flames, betwixt Queene Elizabeth of England, and Philip the second of that Name, King of Spaine; whose first breaking forth was in the Netherlanders cause, the one persecuting, and the other defending the Religion that those people profest; and thus it began. In the yeere of Grace 1575, Don Lewis, Gouernour of those Low-Countries for the said King, sent his Agent vnto Queene Elizabeth, desiring her to banish such of them as repayred to England, onely their flight, and their religion, all the cause alleaged against them.

Edward Grimston in hist. Nether. lib. 10.

The Spanish hostility with England.

Don Lewis sent to haue the Netherlanders banished out of England.

(160) Her answer was short, and nothing acceptable, that shee held it vnworthy the Maiesty of a Prince, to chase away those poore exiled and scattered Netherlanders, that were fled into her Dominions, for the safety of their liues, and to auoid the Spanish tyranny, exercised onely in case of their consciences. And yet shee forbad some men of speciall note, as also such as bare armes, to enter England, vpon condition that Westmorland should bee banished the Low-Countries, with such other Rebels as had fled to the Spaniard. But the Clergy intending to bring their Spanish Inquisition into those parts, the Prince of Orange entred conference with the States of Holland and Zeland, touching the defence fence of their professed religion, and the preseruation of their distressed Countries, vnable of themselues (as was alleaged) long to defend themselues, and therefore it was thought fittest to choose them a Protector.

The Emperour the French King the Queene of England in election for defence.

(161) This passing for currant among the Counsellors of estate, three were in name, the Emperour, the French King, and the Queene of England; for they were past all hope of any assurance with Spaine. Yea of these in choise, some excepted against, as neither safe nor conuenient to be yeelded vnto. Against the Empire was alleaged the diuersities of religion, the small vnion of those Germane Princes, and hauing their hands full to keepe their owne at home, would bee the lesse able to assist with helpe abroad The French (they feared) had wasted their money the onely meanes for warre) with their owne ciuill dissentions; if not, yet might they hardly be trusted, as witnessed the cruell massacre lately committed. England then was the Pillar to which they must leane; their Queene the greatest of all Christian Princes, their Nauy the Commandresse of the Seas; and their people professing the same Religion with them, the surest band of Christian society: further it was alleaged that the Realmes of Denmarke and Sweden desired it, the County of Emden and the Hanse Townes in the East intreated for it, Brabant and Flanders sought it; yea and the rightfull Title of the Princes Elizabeth, issued from the Earles of Holland, and Zeeland by the Lady Philip, daughter to William the third of that name, Earle of Henault and Holland, did warrant it.

Obiectiõ against the French King.

Queene Elizabeth chosen to be the defender.

The reasons alleaged to haue Elizabeth their gouernour.

(162) Thus then concluded, the States were sent vnto England, and made the end of their comming knowne to the Queene; who wisely weighing into what a Labirinth shee should enter, sought rather the safety of her owne, then to consent to their motion; for Spaine shee well knew would storme at the Vnion, and France bee in great iealousie to haue such a neighbour; shee therefore promising to bee a mediator vnto the King of Spaine for their peace; and after some complements of Princely entertainments, with thankes for their offer, and sufferance to carry with them many voluntary Englisb souldiers, let them depart: whose deniall made knowne, was nothing welcome to those distressed Prouinces.

The States of the Low-Countries sent to the English Queene.

(163) Long after this, Lewis the Gouernour liued not, whom Don Iohn of Austria (base brother to King Philip) succeeded; who at first made shew of most fauourable affection, yet so, as vrging their subiection to Spaine; and obedience to the Apostolicall See of Rome. Neither would hee come to their Counsell, without Hostages deliuered, and most of their troupes to guard his suspecting person, esteeming them Lutherans and Heretikes, in whom was no trust.

Don John made gouernour of the Low-Countries.

(164) These mooued the States once more to sue to her Maiesty, that by her meanes, with peace they might enioy the antient Priuiledges of their Prouinces, and the freedom of their own consciences against the Inquisition and Tyranny of Spaine; and indeed so lamentably deplored their case, that the pitty-full Queene sent into Spaine, to desire the King in commiseration to withdraw these extremities from the distressed. But Philip deafe on that eare, and Iohn planting his Garrisons with suspicious intents, Elizabeth beganne to looke to the maine, sending the King word, shee liked not that his Souldiers should bee her bad neighbours, and the Gouernour notice, that she would not suffer the Christian Netherlanders to be tyrannized by his Spaniards. And thereupon caused the value of forty thousand Angels in Bullion, vnminted (in part of an hundred thousand pound sterling promised) to bee sent vnto Brusels, receiuing the States obligations for the same: where also were confirmed certaine conditions betwixt her and them.

The States sue againe to the Queene.

The Queene soliciteth the Spanish King for the States. Ed Grimston lib.10.pag.611.

(165) This mooued Don Iohn to such conceits, that he intended to doe wonders in England, by interposing himselfe in the Scottish affaires, yea, and by the destruction of Queene Elizabeth, whereto hee is said to haue got the Popes good furtherance. But whether by poison or discontents, this great conceited Monarch left the Crowne of England where it gloriously stood, and laid his owne head in the graue of death.

Ed. Grim. l.b.10. pag.619.

(166) And indeed so glorious was Elizabeths fame, growne now more potent by the Low-Countries engagements, that the wise Statists of France, feared their owne Starre would be dimmed at the presence of her bright Sunne. For Henry their King, though he made great shewes to doe much, both in the Church and Councell of State; in feasts, in maskes, and in treading the measures of dances, dallied out both day and night in vnmeasurable delights: and yet the Clergy to hold in their owne hands the raines of Church-gouernment, with Bels, Bookes, and Beads, sounded forth the zeale of his religious piety in the eares of their auditories: And to manage all temporall affaires at their owne dispose, the Queen Mother, and the Guize laid loose the bridle in his owne necke, not abridging his pleasures with their grauer aduices. But lest the English maiden Queene should bee a maule to the Churchmens Massings, or disturbe these State-guiders by claime (as shee had done) of her owne right in France; the marriage motioned nine yeeres before, betwixt their Kings brother Francis Valois Duke of Anion, and Elizabeth Englands faire Queene, was againe sollicited, in hope by this match to make her wholly theirs, the better to establish their peace: and so effectually was the sute mooued, and so acceptably heard of her Maiesty, that the Monsieur came ouer in person to wooe her himselfe; though to the little liking of many Nobles, and great discontent to the Commons, as (amongst other appearances) was made knowne by a booke written against it, for which by reason of some personall and ouer-lauish passages) the * Inditor lost his hand. But whether her Maiesty affected not marriage, or disliked the man, or else out of her tender care not to giue the least griefe or distaste to her Subiects, after most Princely and magnificent entertainment shee let him depart without any promise of a nuptiall knot.

His departure.

(167) The fame of this Duke was very renowned, and much the more by the Englisb Queenes fauours; in so much, that the distressed vnited Prouinces, after they had declared Philip of Austria (then King of Spaine) by his too violent Gouernment against their priuiledges (whereunto he had sworne) to be an enemy vnto their state and peace, and therefore vpon breach of couenants, to haue fallen from his interest among them, chose this hopefull Monsieur to be their Protector, as a Prince most powerfull to defend their cause; of whose triumphes and French trecheries there, let Serres and Petit report for me.

(168) He dying in France (penitent and sorrowfull for what hee had done) and William of Nassau Prince of Orange (by an Edict from Spaine proclaimed a Traitor, his Lands and goods giuen to them that could bring him either dead or aliue, with a further reward of twenty fiue thousand Crownes annuall) was first dangerously wounded in the face with a Pistoll, & at last murthered with the like shot by the base hand of an odious traytor at his Court in Delfe in Holland: whereupon the oppressed Prouinces once more sued for reliefe, both to her Maiesty of England, as also vnto Henry the French King.

(170) Her Councell then aſſembled to conferre of the buſineſſe, many waighty conſiderations amongſt them were mooued, and laſtly concluded, that her Maieſty ought to accept of the offer. The defence of Gods Goſpell was the firſt motiue, ſhe being the nurſing mother of Chriſts diſtreſſed Saints: The Spaniſh Inquiſition, that without reſpect had perſecuted her Subiects contrary to right, was too cruell to be tollerated: Philips Army with flying colours ſent lately into Ireland vpon gift made vnto him by the Pope, with a purpoſe of the like enterprize for England; bewraied their intents; and laſtly the hard meaſure that was to bee expected for England, if the Spaniards ſeated in theſe neere Netherland Prouinces was to be preuented. Theſe important reaſons for her owne State, and pitty of theirs, mooued her Maieſty to become their Defender, but would in no wiſe take the Title of Soueraigne Lady thereof, which they would haue conferred vpon Her and her heires.

Printed by Chriſtopher Barker. An.D.1585. Anno Reg. 27.

(173) The naturall ſituation of thoſe Countries, lying directly oppoſite to England; the neereneſſe, commodious hauens, and commerce of thoſe people with the Engliſh, euen when they were ſeuerall; and not yet vnited together, as of late yeeres they haue been, by inter-marriages, and reduced vnder the gouernments of the Lords that ſucceeded in the Dukedome of Burgundy; betwixt whom and the Engliſh Kings, hath been a continuall league, as alſo betwixt the naturall Subiects of both Countries, both of commerce for Merchants, as all other ſpeciall bonds of mutuall amity. For teſtimony of which there are extant ſundry Authentique treatiſes and tranſactions for mutuall commerce, intercourſe and ſtraite amity of ancient times; as betwixt King Henry the ſixth, and Philip the Second Duke of Burgundy; which was reuiued by Duke Charles his ſonne (Father to the King of Spaines Grand-mother, and husband to the Lady Margaret, ſiſter to King Edward the fourth) and againe confirmed by King Henry the ſeuenth and the Arch-Duke Philip, Grand-father to the King of Spaine. And of later yeeres betwixt King Henry the eight, and Charles the fifth, Emperour of Almaine, Father to Philip now King of Spaine. In all which treatiſes it was at all times ſpecially contained in expreſſe words, that the naturall people and Subiects of either ſide ſhould ſhew mutuall fauours and duties one to the other: But now Philip of Spaine departing the Low-Countries, and appointing Spaniards, Forreiners and Strangers, men exerciſed in warre, and delighted in blood to bee chiefe Gouernours of all the ſaid Low-Countries, contrary to their ancient Laws and coſtomes, who vpon ambition, and for priuate lucre haue violently broken the Liberties, as the people alleage; and in a tyrannous ſort haue baniſhed, killed and deſtroyed within the ſpace of a few moneths many of the moſt ancient and principall perſons, of the naturall Nobility, haue brought in inteſtine warres, made the Country in a manner deſolate by famine, ſword, and other exactions. So that the people are forced for the ſafety of their liues to ſeeke the protection of other forraine Lords, or rather to yeeld themſelues wholy to the ſoueraignty of ſome mighty Monarch, as not onely by the ancient laws of their Countries they may, but euen by ſpeciall priuiledges granted to the people by ſome of the Lords and Dukes of the Prouinces as they doe affirme, whereby they are free from their former homages, and at liberty to make choiſe of any other to be their Prince and head.

Bernardyn Mendoza the Spaniſh Lieger Ambaſſador practiſeth an inuaſion.

(174) Beſides theſe reaſons concerning them, the practiſes of Bernardin de Mendoza (Lieger Ambaſſador in England for Philip King of Spaine) who by the directions of Francis Throgmorton, contriued to bring in a forraine power to the deſtruction of Englands eſtate, it was not onely held a worke of piety to defend theſe diſtreſſed Chriſtians, but alſo a neceſſary policy to aide the Low-Countries Proteſtants with Englands ſupply, the better to impeach theſe dangerous aſſignes. And how ioyous her protection was to theſe Prouinces, the deliuery of Fluſhing with the Caſtell of Ramekins vnto Sir Philip Sidney, and the Brill vnto Sir Thomas Cecill, appointed by her Maieſty the Gouernours thereof, is witneſſed by the letters of Prince Maurice himſelfe, wherein hee ſignified the great ioy and hopes that he conceiued, and his willing ſurrender of the ſame towne Fluſhing, being his patrimoniall inheritance.

The ioy conceiued at Elizabeths protection.

(176) The States hauing drawne inſtructions of Counſell for their Countries affaires, preſented the ſame to their new made Gouernour, whoſe anſwere was, that ſuch inſtructions would proue limitations, which his authority now being abſolute, could no waies indure: they greatly miſtruſting whereat hee did aime, bewailed the miſeries wherunto their Country ſeemed to be brought, yet they ſuffered him to chooſe his Counſellors of Eſtate, and to ſtampe his owne Armes both in their great and Counter-Seale: which when the Queene their aſſiſter vnderſtood, ſhee was offended both with them and him, ſuppoſing her ſelfe to bee drawne further then euer ſhee entended, or that ſhee had yeelded vnto in the Declaration, where her ſelfe had granted to bee their Aider, but neuer would graunt to bee the Soueraigne of thoſe Countries.

(177) Things

Troubles in traffick vpon the seas.

(177) Things thus passing betwixt England and the Vnited Prouinces, the English Marchants Ships and goods were arrested in Spaine, which caused many to leaue the trade of Merchandizing, and to become men of Warre on the Seas, where alwayes the Spaniard, whosoeuer wanne, went to the worst. But on the Land, the Prince of Parma held Plea; for whose further safety Pope Sixtus the fift sent him a consecrated Sword with a Hatte, and to his men of Warre the Apostolicall blessing, with eternall life for them that should die in the Catholike Romish faith.

A consecrated Sword sent to Prince Parma.

(178) Another feare was blowne into the Netherlanders eares, which sore troubled them though without all cause, for it was diuulged by sinister reports, that Queen Elizabeth meant to make peace with the King of Spaine, without either mention or regard for the safety of her vnited Confederates. Shee touched in honour, whereof shee was euer iealous, wrote her letters to Prince Parma in answere of his, that had mentioned the same, and to these doubtfull Netherlanders, to assure them the contrary, both which were dated from Richmond vpon one and the same day.

The feares of the distressed Netherlanders.

(179) Now Leicester not liking to lie still, and doe nothing, made his preparation for Zutphen, which being in want of victuals, the Prince of Parma sought to supply, to intercept which, Sir Iohn Norris was sent, and to the saide seruice came the Earle of Essex, the Lord Willoughby, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir William Stanley, and Sir William Russell, in all two hundred horse, and fifteene hundred Musketiers and Pikes: the Parma hauing seauen hundred horse, and two thousand foote, appointed with the like defence.

July 19. A.D.1586.

(180) The day being darke through great foggy mists, the Spaniard whilest their Wagons made forward, stayed in a place of aduantage neere vnto Zutphen, vpon whom the English were entred before they were aware, and were entertained with a furious charge of shot, which notwithstanding they abode, and so valiantly followed the skirmish, that they ouerthrew a cornet of horse, and tooke Cressier the Captaine thereof prisoner, and after him Count Hanniball Gonzaga, another Cornet also they put backe and slew. But in this the day was made vnfortunate, that the worthy Sir Philip Sidney as he changed his horse, was shot by a Musket aboue the left knee, which so shiuered the thigh-bone, that the Bullet could not bee recouered, of which wound he died fiue and twenty dayes after, to the no little griefe of her Maiesty, and many others, for the great hopes they had of that worthy Gentleman; in whom were compleat all vertues and valours that could be required or residing in man.

A conflict at Zutphen.

Sir Philip Sidney shot with a musket, whereof hee dyed.

(181) Good seruice done vpon the Sconces neer Zutphen, so that the Towne seemed to bee blocked vp; his Excellency (so did they now enstile the Earle) made Rowland Yorke the Gouernour thereof, and ouer Deuenter Sir William Stanley, to the great discontents of the Estates, for that Yorke had been a double Traitor in seruice, and Stanley before time had serued the Spaniard. Other grieuances also they then beganne to complaine of, and by petition to his Excellency sought the redresse; but hee minding for England, with faire words held them in expectance vntill such time as hee should returne againe.

Yorke and Stanley made gouernors of townes.

(182) The State-Souldiers found themselues agreeued, that they were not dealt with according to custome, degrees or desert, (as that the Sergeant should be aduanced to be Ensigne, the Ensigne Sergeant Maior, and so vpward) they venturing their liues to winne reputation. And the Earle of Holocke held himselfe much wronged, in that Sir Edward Noris vpon words spoken at Table, sent him a letter of challenge to fight with him body to body; the Earle then lying sicke of a wound receyued at Zutphen, which hee disdainefully tooke, as being his vnequall, and partly imputed it to the sufferance of his Excellency. But more neerely touched the losse of Deuenter and Sconce at Zutphen, traiterously sold vnto the Spaniard by Sir William Stanley, and Rowland Yorke Englishmen, whom Leicester had left there at his departure. These things droue the the Counsell of State into many iealousies, that the English entended as the French had done.

Grudges and grieuances at Leicesters doings.

Stanley and Yorke traiterously sell their Townes.

(183) The occasion that mooued the Lord Generall to return into England, was for his presence in Parliament, wherein was handled the waighty cause of that great Princesse Mary Queene of Scotland, whose vntimely death and vnfortunate end was finished at Fotheringhay Castle in the County of Northampton, to the great discontent of her Maiesty, as was manifestly seen * to all her people, by the griefe shee conceiued, and high displeasure shee tooke against the forward * Actor, both in casting him into the Tower of London, and neuer admitting him after into her presence, or his place. The body of the deplored Queene was solemnly interred in the Cathedrall Church of Peterborow, where it remained vnder a Hearse of black veluet. But by his Maiesties appointment was thence remoued vnto the Collegiat Church of S. Peters in Westminster, and in the most magnificent Chappel of K. Henry the VII. interred vnder a Princely Monument of white marble, with her picture according to life artificially imitated by sculpture.

(184) In this absence of Leicester euery seuerall Captaine tooke vpon him the place of a Generall, whereby many desperate seruices were attempted, and great robbery by their Souldiers committed, so that it was feared all would come to ruine. To preuent which, a Counsell for State was assembled at Dunhage, where Maurice Nassau, the younger sonne of Willam Prince of Orange was elected their Gouernor, and the Prouinces sworn vnto him, with a reseruation had vnto her Maiesty; when also a great complaint was sent into England, which to examine, the Lord Buckhurst was sent into Holland; at whose doings Leicester tooke offence, but especially against Sir Iohn Noris (that renowned Leader) whom to the great dislike of the States, he caused to bee recalled, and sent into Ireland.

Maurice Nassau chosen gouernour of the Low-Countries.

Sir Iohn Noris sent into Ireland.

(185) Leicester the Lord Generall hoping to recouer his wel-nigh lost reputation, landed in Zeeland, gallantly accompanied, where hee made a forward shew of great seruice; but such was the successe, that Sluce was surrendred, and the occasion thereof partly imputed to him; when also beganne many factious abettings betwixt the Estates and his Excellency, so that some Townes vtterly reiected his gouernment, and hee againe sought to seize vpon some other.

July 6.

Sluce surrendred.

(186) The care of preuentiug further mischiefes, moued her Maiesty hereupon to recall the Earle of Leicester into England, well knowing that a Kingdom diuided could not long stand: who on his returne, shee commanded to resigne his gouernment of the Netherlanders into the hands of the Generall Estates, which was performed by act, signed vnder his hand, and sent vnto them: which resignation receiued, was presently proclaimed through al the Prouinces, to the end that euery man might know himselfe discharged of his oath to the Earle of Leicester.

Leicester discharged of his gouernment in the Low-Countries.

(187) Now Philip King of Spaine espying these dissentions, thought it a fitte aduantage for him to worke vpon, hauing a long time proiected an attempt for England, and at that time preparing a mighty Nauy vpon the seas. To cast therefore a myst ouer her Maiesties eyes, and to driue all iealousies out of her head, hee importuned by all meanes the Realmes vnto peace. She measuring other Princes by her owne true-meaning, and peacefull dispositions, gaue eare to his guilefull lullaby, without suspition of any snake to bee hid in so floury a garden; and therefore sent to the Estates to vnderstand their resolution for an vniuersall peace, protesting ſting that if they ſtood out, ſhee would withdraw her whole forces from thence.

The Low Country States feare to haue peace with Spaine.

(188) They, like themſelues anſwered with a bold deniall, neither thought they that ſhee could haue any peace with him that was head of the holy League, and perſecuted the exerciſe of the reformed Religion, whoſe policy (as they feared) was but to detract time, till his ſea-prouiſions were better ripened, as indeed the ſequell ſoone proued. The terror of this prepared, and Inuincible Nauy (as the Spaniards tearmed it) ſpreading it ſelfe wide, and menacing fearefull ſtormes both vnto the Engliſh and Flemiſh; the Eſtates like prouident reſpecters of themſelues, and thankfull men to their Protectreſſe, prepared their ſhipps of warre to aſſiſt her Maieſty, and preſſed a thouſand ſailers of the Netherlanders for her ſeruice on ſeas.

A.D. 1588. Feb. 24.

(189) During this brute of the Spaniſh proceedings, Commiſſioners were ſent out of England to conferre vpon conditions of the pretended peace with the Duke Parma, Lieutenant for the King of Spaine, who for that purpoſe came to Oſtend. For her Maieſty were aſſigned Henry Earle of Derby, William Lord Cobham Warden of the Cinque-ports, with Sir James Croft, and others. For King Philip, were Maximilian Earle of Aremberg, Gouernour of Antwerpe, Monſieur Richardot Preſident of Artois, and Counſellor of State, beſides other Ciuilians. Theſe ſtayed at Bruges, and by meſſages too and fro much time was ſpent for precedency of place, where they ſhould meet, and what hoſtages ſhould bee giuen for ſecurity of ſides; yet laſtly, the Engliſh had the priority, and the place was Oſtend.

The Queenes demands.

(190) The demaund of the Queene was, to haue a ſurceaſe of Armes, with a preſent and vndelayed truce, miſtruſting the Kinges preparation at Sea. The ſending away of forraine ſouldiers out of the Low-Countries for Englands ſafety. A reſtitution of ſuch ſummes of money as the Queen had lent vnto the Eſtates, which the King had promiſed by his Edict made at Bruſels. That the Netherlanders might enioy their ancient liberties and priuiledges, nor bee gouerned by a ſtranger, but by a Natiue Prince. That the Religion might bee permitted for two yeeres at leaſt. And laſtly; that the Articles of Pacification of Gant, and other like Treaties might bee obſerued. And theſe being concluded; the Townes ſhee poſſeſſed ſhould bee deliuered vpon ſuch reaſonable conditions, as all the world ſhould witneſſe ſhee tooke them not to her owne vſe, or commodity, but onely vpon a neceſſary defence and aſſurance.

The Spaniſh ſhifts and anſweres.

(191) To theſe the Spaniards replyed, that touching their preparation for Sea, they did aſſure them it nothing concerned England. To ſend away their Souldiers, their King could not reſolue; vntill that the Netherlanders had ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. Concerning their priuiledges, it appertained nothing to the Queene, neither ſhould ſhee preſcribe to the King a law. And ſo farre was hee from tolerating Religion, that hee would not heare thereof, otherwiſe then hee had allowed vnto other Towns that had ſubmitted vnto his obedience: and the like anſwere made they for the Pacification of Gant.

The Popes Bull ſent forth againſt England.

(192) The propoſitions further vrged, and anſwered with dilatory delayes, Pope Sixtus the fift (the prime man in the intended Tragedy) obſeruing well the time, among other beaſts ſent foorth his Bull to thunder out bolts againſt Englands Queen, confirming the Excommunications of his two Predeceſſors, and depriuing her Maieſty from all Princely dignity; for whoſe finall diſpoſſeſſion, hee then ordained his Catholike ſonne Philip of Spaine, commanding all her Subiects, vpon paine of his curſe, (oh fearefull bugge-beare) to aid and aſſiſt the great, noble, and Inuincible Armie, prepared to that end vnder the command of the Duke of Parma. And Allen an Engliſhman, an eager Trumpeter to this exploit, now purpoſely made Cardinall by the Pope (to ſhew his Holy affection to the Engliſh Nation) would not lie idle, but ſet himſelf on worke to write a Booke exhortatory to the Nobility of England and Ireland, to rouze them vp to the execution of the Popes ſentence againſt their Soueraigne, in aſſiſting K. Philip, who was made the whip in his Holineſſe hand, and the Duke of Parma who was appointed the chiefe Commander in that action, which Booke (fraught with all impudency of diuelliſh ſlanders againſt her ſacred perſon) was printed at Antwerpe in Anno 1588.

Cardinall Allen traiterous libell.

(193) This Bull and Booke comming to the Queenes knowledge; ſhe ſent vnto Parma (who had gained the reputation of ſome Princely vertues) to deale plainly with her; if ſo, then meant ſhe no longer to continuet he treaty of peace: but he with many Courtly complements denied his authority, neither had ſeen (as he ſaid) any ſuch preſcripts. Moreouer the Engliſh Commiſſioners preſſed the conditions, purpoſely to find ſome footſteps of this cloſe-carried deſigne, when at laſt it burſt forth in theſe termes, that the King of Spaine had kept fifty thouſand men in pay almoſt a whole yeere to lie ſtill and doe nothing; to his great charge by the meanes of that treaty. At which very inſtant, theſe their hidden traps and toyles apparantly ſhewed themſelues, when the Seas were turretted with ſuch a Nauy of ſhips; as her ſwelling waues could hardly be ſeen, and the Flagges, Streamers, and enſignes, ſo ſpread in the winde, that they ſeemed to darken euen the Sunne, which put the Engliſh Commiſſioners in ſome ſuſpition and feare, hauing no hoſtages for their ſafe returne.

The Queene ſent to Prince Parma.

(194) This Inuincible Nauie long in preparing and now in readineſſe, was furniſhed with all prouiſions of warres, and with many brauadoes ſpread their ſailes for Englands inuaſion, guided by the Prouinciall Generals, whoſe names the numbers of Veſſels, Ordinances, Sailers, Souldiers, and Slaues, as I find them recorded, in this enſuing Table are inſerted.

(195) Admirable (as ye ſee) was the prouiſion of this mighty Armado, and ſo confident was the Spaniard that England ſhould pay the whole ſhot, that no coſt of any thing was at all ſpared; of bullets for great ſhot were two hundred and twenty thouſand; of powder foure thouſand and two hundred kintals, euery kintall containing a hundred weight; of lead for bullets one thouſand kintals, and one thouſand and two hundred kintals of match; ſeuen thouſand Muskets and Caliuers, ten thouſand Partizans and Halberts, with murthering Peeces, double Canons, and field Peeces for Campe; with ſtore of furniture for carriages, Mules and Horſes, ſo that they were ſufficiently prouided both for Sea and Land. Bread and Bisket was baked, and Wine laid aboard for ſixe moneths prouiſion; ſixe thouſand and fiue hundred kintals of Bacon, three thouſand of Cheeſe, beſides fleſh, Rice, Beanes, Peaſe, Oyle, and Vinegar, with twelue thouſand Pipes of freſh water, ſtore they had of Torches, Lanthornes, and Lampes, Cannas, Hides, and Lead to ſtop leakes, whips, and butchery kniues; for what vſe we may imagine. In a word, by the report of Don Diego Piementell, the Army was two and thirty thouſand ſtrong, and coſt the King of Spaine thirty thouſand Ducats euery day.

Their Regiments

(196) In this Army were fiue regiments of old Spaniſh Souldiers, of the Tertios, of Naples, Sicily, and the Terceraes, commanded by fiue Maſters Del Campo; The firſt was Don Diego de Piementel, a Knight of the Order of Saint Iohn, brother to the Marqueſſe of Taueras, and Couſen to the Earle of Benuent and Calui. The ſecond Colonel was Don Franciſco de Toledo, brother to the Earle of Orgas: the third, Don Alonzo de Luzon: the fourth, Don Nicholas de Illa, or Patritio Anſelmo: and the fift, was Auguſtin Mexia, brother to the Marqueſſe de la Garda, who was afterwards made Gouernour of Antwerp; each company hauing in his regiment two and thirty companies, beſides the Caſtilians and Portugals bands, each of them hauing their peculiar Gouernours, Captaines, Officers, Colours, and weapons.

The Admirall was Don Iohn Martinez de Richald, the Marſhal Don Franciſco Bouadille: and the chiefe Counſellers for the warre, were Diego Piementell, Floris de Valdes, Pedro de Valdez, Michael Oquendo, Don Alanzo de Lieua, Don Diego Maldonado, and Don Georgio Manriquez. Don Martin Alarcon was ordained Vicar Generall for the holy Inquiſition, in whoſe traine were a hundred Monkes and Ieſuites: and Cardinall Allen was appointed the Superintendent of all Eccleſiaſticall matters throughout England; who fearing to be ouertaken with time, tranſlated Pope Sixtus his Bull into Engliſh, that it might be the ſooner publiſhed vpon the arriual of the Spaniſh Fleete into that Kingdome. Of voluntary aduenturers, were an hundred twenty foure, Noblemen, and Gentlemen of great account; all of them furniſhed at their owne charges: among whom was the Prince of Aſcoli, Alonzo de Leiua, the Marqueſſe of Pennafiel, the Marqueſſe de Ganes, the Marqueſſe de Barlango, the Count de Paredes, the Count de Telnas, and diuers other Marqueſſes and Earles of Honourable Families of Mendoza, Toledo, Pachieco, Cordouas, Cuzma, and Manricques, neither was there any Noble Houſe of Spaine, but had a ſon, brother, or nephew in the voyage, in hope of reuenewes and riches in England.

Two hundred more were made of the like faſhion, though not ſo big, and lay ready in the Hauen of Newport; at Dunkirke lay thirty ſeauen ſhips of warre, wherein ſtore of pyles were beſtowed, ſharpened at the end with yron pykes, to pile vp the mouthes of Riuers; and at Graueling hee had prouided twenty thouſand empty Caskes, with Cords, and other furniture fit to make floating Bridges to ſtop vp the Hauens. He likewiſe had ſhipped great abundance of Saddles, Bridles, with all other furniture for Horſe; and Horſes alſo for carriage, with Ordinance, and other prouiſions of warre.

And to this Land-ſeruice came the Duke of Paſtrana, ſuppoſed to be the Spaniſh Kings baſe ſonne: the Marqueſſe of Bourgon, one of the Archduke Ferdinands ſonnes, Don Veſpaſian Gonſagua of the Houſe of Mantua, a great Souldier, who had beene Viceroy of Spaine, Don Iohn de Medices Baſtard of Florence, Don Amedeus baſtard of Sauoy, with many others of the like eſtate.

The Popes Cruſado.

(200) Neither muſt you think, that Sixtus Quintus the Pope of Rome, did in any wiſe neglect his diligence and deuotion to this intended inuaſion; whoſe helping hand was ſhewed, in ſending forth his Cruſado (as hath been vſed againſt the Turkes) and publiſhing a ſafe paſport for his Philippians to enter into England. Who alſo for the furtherance of the enterpriſe, vndertooke to contribute a million of gold, the halfe preſently, and the other when any notable Hauen in that Land ſhould be wonne; with this proniſo notwithſtanding (moſt wiſely inſerted) that hee ſhould hold the Engliſh Crowne as feudatory vnto the See of Rome; in earneſt whereof, he beſtowed vpon him his Apoſtolicall benediction, and the Title of the Defendor of the Faith: ſo liberall was he, both in his temporall and ſpirituall largeſſes, and ſo forward was Philip to catch at Elizabeths ſtill flouriſhing Crowne. But her vndanted heart in this preſent danger, as another Ezekiah, ſought vnto the Lord, whoſe Annointed ſeruant ſhee was, and who euer had beene her onely defendant. And for preuenting thoſe long threatned ſtormes, ſhee ſent Charles Howard, Lord Baron of Effingham, High Admirall of England, vnto the Seas, where the Lord Henry Seymer kept betwixt Callis and Douer, ſeconded by the Ships of the vnited Prouinces, in league with the Queene.

The French King giues notice to the Queen of the preparation.

(201) The French King, who euer honoured and admired Queene Elizabeths great and gracious vertues, hauing more particular intelligences that this great preparation was made againſt England, gaue ſpeedy and ſecret notice thereof to her Maieſty; whereupon ſhee commanded the generall Forces of the Realme in their ſeuerall Shires to be muſtered, trayned, and put in readineſſe for the defence of the whole; which accordingly was done, and whereof the Lord Robert Dudley, Earle of Leiceſter, and Steward of her Houſhold, was appointed Lieutenant. Tilbury in Eſſex was the place for the Camp, whereunto were appointed 15000. Horſemen, and twenty two thouſand of Foote, and to guard her Maieſties Perſon, out of the ſeuerall Counties of the Weſt, Eaſt, and South parts of England, were ſelected two thouſand, three hundred, fifty two Horſemen, and thirty foure thouſand and fifty of Foote; her ſelfe in courage farre ſurmounting her ſexe, as another Zenobia, or rather Deborah, led forth the Lords Hoaſt againſt this great Siſera, and her Souldiers valiant for warre, and apt for battell, Men skilfull to handle Speare and Shield, both for courage and quicke diſpatch, might well bee compared vnto thoſe Gadites that came to aide Dauid, whoſe faces were like to the faces of Lyons, and were compared to Roes in the Mountaines for ſwiftneſſe.

(202) The Inuincible Nauie, and terrour of Europe, as the Papals both termed, and tooke it to be, hauing all things prepared, looſed Anchor from Lisbon, vpon the nineteenth of May, and made vnto the Groine in Gallicia, it being the neereſt Hauen to England, whence hoyſing ſayles with great hope and pride, bent their courſe thitherward: but ſuddenly the Heauens hating ſuch hoſtile actions, powred downe reuenge, by a ſore and vnexpected tempeſt, which draue the Duke of Medina, the chiefe Generall backe againe into the Groine; eight other of their ſhips being diſperſed on Seas, their maſts broken and blowne ouer-board; beſides three Portingall Gallies which fell vpon the Coaſt of Bayon in France, and were ſet vpon by their owne ſlaues, whereof Dauid Goyn an Engliſhman was the firſt, who with his fellowes both French and Turkes, freed themſelues by the ſlaughter of many Spaniards, among whom, Don Diego de Mandrana, was one.

(203) Charles Howard, Lord Admirall, hearing for certaine that their Fleete was ready to hoyſe vp their ſayles, had ſent the worthy Sir Francis Drake, who was conſtituted his Vice-Admirall, vnto the Weſt parts, with ſixty ſixe ſhippes well appointed, whither himſelfe alſo following with ſpeed, and ioyning his Fleete, their number amounted to one hundred ſhippes, whereof fifteene were Victuallers, and nine Voluntaries of Deuonſhire Gentlemen; many a ſeruiceable man returning backe for lacke of imployment or place. Theſe from Plymouth reſoluing and * aſſaying to put forth to Seas, were ſo met with the wind, that paſt the Syllies they could not attaine, and thence alſo were forced by tempeſt into the Hauen, (from whence they lanched) to refreſh their ſhips and Companies; where lying at Anker, the ſcouts at Sea had deſcryed ſome ſayles of the Spaniards, which had beene likewiſe diſtreſſed by the ſtormes; but before theſe could be haled, the wind came about, and brought them to the Groine, where the reſt lay in Harbour.

(204) Intelligence ſpreading that the Spaniards were in want, their great ſhippes diſperſed, the reſt ſtorme-ſhaken, and their men by multitudes dying with the peſtilence; the Lord Admirall meant to vſe the aduantage vpon the firſt North-winde, which came about the eight day of Iuly, and bare his ſayle almoſt within ſight of Spaine, when ſuddenly it changing into the South, and he wiſely fore-ſeeing, that the enemy might paſſe without his diſcouery, that the Seas might be ſtormy, and his Fleet windbound, and that whileſt they thus lay abroad, their ſeruice much better might be employed at home, hee therefore preſently returned, and ankered his Fleet in the Hauen of Plymouth, ſuffering his men to relieue themſelues on Land.

The Spaniards againe ſet forth.

(205) But the Spaniards ſhips new rigged, and their wants ſupplyed, their King ſtill hote on his former reſolutions, inſtantly vrged and haſtened his Chiefetaines to put againe to Sea, which accordingly was done vpon the eleuenth of Iuly, waying their Ankers at the Groin, where with braue ſhewes, and full ſayles they came into the Chanels of the narrow Seas, where they caſt anker, and diſpatched certaine ſmall Pinaces vnto the Duke of Parma, to ſignifie their arriuall and readineſſe, and to command him in the name of the King to forward his charge for that ſeruice.

The Engliſh haue notice o their approch.

(206) The Engliſh Fleete being in Harbour, and many men on ſhore, Captaine Thomas Fleming (ſome ſay a Pyrate) deſcried the Spaniard vpon the point of the Lazard, the wind being then South and by Weſt: He haſtening to Plimouth, made relation thereof vnto the Lord Admirall, the newes was more fearefull, for that it was ſudden, the Queene hauing receiued intelligence for certaine, that this great Armado would not come forth that yeere, their Bulkes being ſo diſperſed and bruiſed, and their wants and ſickeneſſe ſo great, vpon which raſh reports (a dangerous matter in State-affaires,) ſo confident ſhee was, that ſhee ſent for foure of her talleſt royall ſhippes, to be brought againe vnto Chattam; but Flemings vnexpected diſcouery hindred that purpoſe, and all hands were ſet on worke to warpe out the Shippes, the wind blowing hard, and hindering the ſame.

They ſet forth from Plimouth.

Iuly 20.

(207) The next day about noone, this terrible Fleete

Fleet was descryed by the English, who with a South-west wind came forward amain, and (as seemed) they made for Plimouth. But whether their Commission were otherwise, or for that they saw the English ships out of the Harbour, they passed by towards Callis, well hoping about those Coasts to meete with Prince Parma, by whose wafting that way, the English got the wind, and eftsoones gaue them chase, and encounter, where fire, smoake, and ecchoing Canons began the parley, and Bullets most freely enterchanged betwixt them, were messengers of each others minde.

The English assaile the Spanish.

July 21.

(208) The next day the two Fleetes fought within Musket shot, where the English Admirall fell most hotely on the Vice-Admirall of Spaine, at which present they well perceiued their owne ouersights; their great Shippes (like Castles) powerfull to defend, but not offend, to stand, but not to moue; and therefore farre vnfit for fight in those narrow Seas: their enemies nimble, and ready at all sides to annoy them, and as apt to escape harmes themselues, by being low built, and easily shot ouer. Therefore they gathered themselues close in forme of a halfe Moone, and slackned their Sayles, that their whole Fleete might keepe together. Notwithstanding, one of their great Gallions, wherein was Don Pedro de Valdez, Vasques de Silua, Alonzo de Sayas, and other Noblemen, was sore battered by the English shot; in auoyding whereof, shee fell fowle vpon another shippe, and ere shee could be cleared, had her fore-mast broken off, which so hindred her sayle, that shee was vnable to keepe way with the Fleet, nor they of courage to succour these Lords, but left both ship and them, in this sudden and vnlooked for distresse. But night comming on, and shee lagging behind, the Lord Admirall supposing neither men nor Marriners to bee left within board, and fearing to loose sight of the Spaniards, past by, and followed the Lanthorne, which he tooke to be borne by Sir Francis Drake, but that renowned Knight, busied vpon fiue great Hulkes, pursued them amaine, which being haled, were found to be Easterlings, and thereupon freed from his further harmes.

A Gallion distressed.

July 22.

(209) The next day following, Sir Francis Drake espying this lagging Gallion, sent forth a Pinnace to command them to yeeld, otherwise his Bullets should force them without further fauour; but Valdez to seeme valorous, answered; that they were foure hundred and fifty strong; that himselfe was Don Pedro, and stood on his honour, and thereupon propounded certaine conditions. But the Knight sent his reply, that he had not leisure to parley, if he would yeeld, presently doe it, if not, he should well proue that Drake was no dastard; whereupon Pedro hearing that it was the fiery Drake, (euer terrible to the Spaniards) who had him in chase, with forty of his followers, came on board Sir Francis his ship; where first giuing him the Conge, he protested, that he, and all his, were resolued to die in defence, had they not fallen vnder his power, whose valour and felicity was so great, that Mars and Neptune seemed to attend him in his attempts, and whose generous mind towards the vanquished, had often been experienced, euen of his greatest foes. Sir Francis requiting his Spanish complements with honourable English curtesies, placed him at his owne Table, and lodged him in his owne Cabbin. The residue of that company were sent vnto Plymouth, where they remained eighteene moneths, till their ransomes were paid; but Sir Francis his Souldiers had well paide themselues with the spoyle of the shippe, wherein were 55. thousand Ducats of gold, which they shared merrily among them. The same day Michael de Oquendo, Admirall to the Quadron Guypusco, and Vice-Admirall to the whole Fleete, suffered no lesse disaster, whose ship being one of the greatest Gallions, fell suddenly on fire, all the vpper part of the shippe, and most of the persons therein consumed, howbeit the Gunpowder in the hold was all saued, and the rest of the scorched Spaniards with the hulke brought into Plymouth, to the great ioy of the beholders.

Don Pedro yeeldeth himselfe.

July 23.

(210) Vpon Tuesday the twenty third of July, the Spaniards approaching right against Portland, the wind came about into the North, as fit as could be wished to further their designes; but the English agill, and fore-seeing all harmes, recouered the aduantage thereof from the Spaniards, and continued that day from morning till night, in battering those vast wooden Castles with shot both great and small; which forced them for their further safety, to gather themselues close into a rundell, their best and greatest Ships standing without, securing the battered and lesse. On this day the soarest fight was performed: wherein, besides other remarkeable harmes, a great Venetian ship, with some other smaller, were surprised, and taken by the English.

July 24.

(211) The foure and twenty day of this present Moneth, the fight was onely betweene the foure great Galliasses, and the English ships, the Spaniards hauing the aduantage, theirs being rowed, and our sayles vnfilled, by reason of the calme, which notwithstanding they sore galled the enemy with chaine shot, therewith cutting asunder their tacklings, cables, and cordage, to their no little annoyance. But wanting powder, which so freely they had spent, they sent men on Land for a further supply, which ministred dislikes (if not suspitions) to many, that we should thus want vpon our own Coasts. In which Interim, a Councell was called, wherein it was decreed that the English Fleete should be diuided into foure Squadrons, and those committed to foure worthy Captaines, and most skilfull Nauigators, whereof the Admirall in the Arke Royall was chiefe, Sir Francis Drake in the Reuenge led the second, Captaine Hawkins the third, and Captaine Frobisher the fourth. Other most valiant Captaines there were in her Maiesties Shippes, as the Honourable Lord Thomas Howard in the Lyon, the Lord Sheffield in the Beare, Sir Robert Southwell in the Elizabeth Ionas, Captaine Baker in the Victory, and Captaine George Penner in the Galeon Leicester.

July 25.

(212) The fiue and twenty of July, the Spaniards were arriued against the Isle of Wight, where was a terrible encounter, each shooting off their whole sides, and not aboue sixscore yards the one from the other; till at length the English so battered the Spanish high Turrets, that they were forced once more to secure themselues in a rundell, and the foresaid Generals so worthily bare themselues in this conflict, that the Lord Admirall bestowed the Order of Knight-hood vpon the Lords Howard and Sheffield, Master Iohn Hawkins, Martin Frobisher, and others. And yet (by the Spanish brags) a false rumour was spread in France, that England was wholly conquered by the Spaniard.

July 27.

(213) Their Fleet making forward about Sunset, the 27. of the same Moneth, came against Douer, and ankered within sight of Callis, intending for Dunkerk, there to ioyne with the Duke of Parma his Forces, without which, they well saw, they could doe nothing. The English Fleete following vp hard vpon them, cast anker so neere, that they lay within Culuering shot. Where the Lord Henry Seymer vnited his to the Lord Admirals Ships. Meane-while the Duke of Medina sent vnto Parma, to bid him make ready his long expected forces; with which messengers many Noblemen of the Spaniards went on Land, among whom was the Prince of Ascoli, the Kings base sonne, who so well liked his shipping, that he made no great hast againe from shoare: wherein he was onely fortunate; for that his Gallion was cast away vpon the Irish coast, and neuer returned to salute Spaine.

(214) Duke Parma hearing the best of this voyage, makes all things ready that lay in his charge; whose hopes were so fixed for Englands Conquest, that the glittering Diadem vpon Queene Elizabeths head, dazeled his ambitious eye, being assured by Cardinall Allen, that he was the man designed to be crowned therewith, and who, from the Pope and Spaine should hold that Kingdome himselfe. Wherefore thinking his Coronet of the Low-Countries Gouernment, would but trouble the English Crowne, and both too weighty to be worne vpon one Head, he committed that charge vnto Count Mansfield the Elder, and making his vowes vnto Saint Mary of Hall in Henault, was already in conceit no lesse then a King. But soone the date of his raigne was expired, and his swelling tyde fallen into a low shallow ebbe; for the day following in his march towards Dunkerke, he heard the thundring Ordinance ring the passing peale of his stile and title, and the same euening had newes of the hard successe of the Spaniards, the hoped aduancers of his dreamed fortunes.

The Fleet disanchored from Calis by stratagem.

(215) They lying then at anker neere Callis, to ioyn their powers with Parmaes, were forced thence by a politike stratagem thus: Their Ships, as Castles pitched in the Seas, had their bulkes so plancked with great beames, that bullets might strike, and sticke, but neuer passe through, so that little auayled the English Canon, except onely in playing on their masts and tackling; whereupon, by her Maiesties aduice and appointment, eight of the English shippes were discharged of men, and filled with gun-powder, pitch, brimstone, and other combustible matter; their Ordinance charged with bullets, stones, chaines, and the like; which vpon Sunday, the eight and twenty of Iuly, at two of the clocke after midnight, were let driue with wind and tyde among the Spanish Fleete, whose Pylots returning, and their traines taking fire, such a sudden thunder-clap was giuen, that the Spaniards affrighted in the dead of the night, were stricken into a horrible feare, lest all their ships should be fired by these; which present mischiefe to auoid, in great perplexity, they hasted to cut their owne Cables, the time being too short to weigh vp their Ankers; and hoysing their sayles, did driue at randome into the Seas, in which haste and confusion, the greatest of their Galliasses fell foule vpon another ship, and lost her Rudder, so that guideless shee droue with the tyde vpon a shelue in the shoare of Callis, where shee was assaulted by the English.

A Galliasse taken.

(216) This Galliasse was of Naples; her Generall Hugh de Moncado, who fought the more valiantly in hope of present rescue of the Prince of Parma; but Sir Amias Preston gaue so fierce an assault, that Moncado was shot dead with a bullet, and the Galliasse boarded, wherein was many a Spaniard slaine, and a number of the rest leaping into the Sea, were drowned; yet Don Antonio de Matiques, a principall Officer, had the hap to escape; and was the first man that brought into Spaine the welcomes of this now vincible Nauy. This huge Bottome, manned with foure hundred Souldiers, and three hundred slaues, had in her also fifty thousand Ducats of the Spanish Kings treasure, a booty well fitting the English Souldiers affections; who hauing ransacked all, and freed the slaues from their miserable fetters, went about to set that vessell of Emptines on fire; but Monsieur Guordon, the Gouernour of Callis, fearing some danger to the Towne or Hauen, would not permit them, but discharged his Ordinance against such as assayed it.

Iuly 29.

(217) The morning after this their miserable hap, ranging themselues againe into order, they approched ouer against Greueling, where once againe the English getting the winde, the Spanish were thereby depriued of the Conueniency of Callis roade, and kept from supply out of Dunkerke; in which Port had rested their full hope of support. Notwithstanding, they were forced to passe by, and so followed by the English, that their Shippes discharged vpon them from morning till night, the conflict prouing dismall to the inuincible Armado; for therein a great Gallion of Biscay perished, the Captaines thereof to auoid ignominy, or to bee accounted valorous, desperatly slew each others; in which distresse also two other great shippes presently sunke. The Saint Philip, and Saint Mathew, two Portugal Gallions were so torne with shot, their tacklings spent, and their bulkes rent, that the water entred in on all sides; in the former of which, was Francis de Toledo, being Colonell ouer two and thirty Bands, who taking his course for the Coast of Flanders, the leake was so great, that he with others, committing themselues to the Skiffe, arriued at Ostend, and the Ship, with the residue, were taken by the Vlishingers.

A Gallion taken.

(218) In the Saint Mathew was embarked Don Diego Pimentelli, Campe-master, and Colonell also of thirty two Bands; whose ship, though very strong, was so pierced with shot, that her Leakes could not be stopt, which knowne, the Duke of Medina sent his Skiffe for him, and some others, to saue themselues from their eminent danger. But he, vpon a Spanish braue, refused so to doe, assaying each way to free himselfe like a Souldier; but not able to keepe sayle with the Fleete, he forth-with made toward the Coast of Flanders, where being espyed by fiue men of warre, was met with, and required to yeeld, which lastly he did vnto Captaine Peter Banderdueste, who carried him into Zeland, where, for a trophy of Victory, his Banner was hung vp in the Church of Leyden in Holland, whose length reached from the very roofe vnto the ground: and another Ship of lesse burthen, coasting also for Flanders, was cast away on the sands.

(219) The Spaniards now finding their BVENVENIDA vnto England farre other then they expected, were content to couch their Fleete close together, not seeking to assayle, but to defend; and the winde comming to the South-west, in the same order passed by Dunkerke, whom the English still followed. But lest Parma should play vpon aduantage, the Lord Admirall dispatched the Lord Henry Seymer, with his Squadron of small shippes, vnto the Coast of Flanders, to second those Hollanders which there kept watch vnder the conduct of Iustin Nassau their Admirall: whose Nauy consisted of thirty fiue Shippes, furnished with most skilfull Mariners, and old experienced Souldiers, whereof twelue hundred were Musketiers, whom the States had culled out of the Garrisons. Their charge was, to stop all entrance into their Hauens, or enter-course with Dunkerke, whither Duke Parma intended, though his men were vnwilling, hearing how their friends were welcome at the Sea, onely the English fugitiues, about seuen hundred, vnder the command of that treacherous Knight, Sir William Stanley, were very forward to be the first that should assault England.

The Hollanders Aides.

English fugitiues proue the most desperate enemies.

(220) But the Armado being now passed the place of their expected supply, and hauing gotten more Sea-roome for their huge bodied Bulkes, * spread their maine sayles, and made away as fast as winde and water would giue them leaue, more fearing the small Fleete and forces of the English, (though nothing in number like vnto them) then standing vpon termes of honour, either of their chieftaines or Inuincible Nauy. But surely, if they had knowne the want of powder that ours sustained, (a fault vnexcusable vpon our owne Coasts) they no doubt would haue stood longer to their tacklings: but God in this, as the rest, would haue vs to acknowledge, that wee were onely deliuered by his owne gracious prouidence and Arme, and not by any policy or power of our owne.

* Iuly 30.

(221) The Vincible Armado, holding on their way, the English Admirall followed, lest they should assay to put into Scotland; but the wind comming faire, and feare of more encounters, with all their sayles spread, they betooke themselues to flight, leauing

Scotland

Scotland on the West, and bending toward Norway; ill aduiſed (but that neceſſity vrged, and God had infatuated their counſels) to put their ſhaken and battered bottoms into thoſe blacke & dangerous Seas; neither was the Climate healthfull for the crazed bodies of the Spaniards, ouer-beaten and tyred with wants, being now entred the degree of Latitude 57, from whence the Lord Admirall returned, leauing ſome Scouts to deſcry their ſucceſſe.

Sigiſt 2.

(222) The Spaniards now cleared from thoſe their haunting ſpirits, conſulted moſt ſeriouſly what was to bee done: the Popes credit was to be reſpected, who had predicted this voyage to fortunate ſucceſſe; the wrath of King Philip was to be feared, his great expenſes thus loſt; the aduenturors loſers, if the voyage ſhould bee left, the glory of the Spaniards laid in the ſuds, the Inuincible Nauy in the ebbe of her fame: and England ſtill England, not lorded by the Spaniard, if they thus without further attempt ſhould returne into Spaine. But with all, fiue thouſand of their ſouldiers were ſlaine; multitudes of ſicke and maimed lay on their hands, twelue of their greateſt ſhips were ſunke, loſt, and taken, their Cables, Maſts and Saile, cut, rent, and broken, with the Engliſh ſhot, their anchors left, where the fired Hulkes forced them, their victuals failing, and freſh-water all ſpent, their enemies no leſſe fierce and vndauntable, then fortunate: and their long expected friend, the Duke of Parma though euer preparing, yet ſtill foreſtalled by the Dutch, moſt firme Allies vnto the Queene: theſe circumſtances wiſely ballanced, the voice went currant for ſpeeding into Spaine.

The Spaniſh conſultation.

(223) But knowing that Scotland (whoſe Religious King was faſt knit in affection, and blood vnto Queene Elizabeth) would yeeld them no comfort, and hopleſſe alſo that Norway would giue them any ſupply, they caſt all their Mules and Horſes ouer-boord for ſparing of their freſh-water: then framing their courſe to ſaile about Cathenes and the coaſts of Ireland, ſo proceeded between the Oreades and Iſles of Farr vnto the 61 degree Northward, whence the Duke of Medina, with his beſt ſtored ſhips tooke Weſtward ouer the maine Ocean towards Biſcay, and ſo arriued ſafely in Spaine, where for his welcome, hee was depoſed from all his authority, forbidden to come at the Court, and commanded to be priuate. Neither could hee thus giue ſatisfaction for his bad ſucceſſes, albeit he imputed it to the treachery of his Mariners, their ignorance, and ſmall experience of thoſe Northern Seas, the want of ſuccors from the Pince of Parma, the tempeſt, ſhipwrackes, and ill fortune, but not a word of the iudgements of God vpon this Gyantlike attempt to enſlaue all England to the mountaines of Grenada or to the mines of Peru.

The Spaniards caſt their horſes into the Sea.

The Duke of Medina diſgraced for his ſucceſſeſſe ſeruice.

(224) The reſidue of his ſhippes, about forty in number, fell neerer with the coaſt of Ireland, intending for Cape Clare, where they well hoped to water, but the winds contrary, and tempeſts ſtorming vpon thoſe dangerous Seas, many of their ſhips periſhed vpon the ſhoares of Ireland, and among other a Great Galliaſſe, wherein Michael de Oquendo was a Commander, and two other of Venice, both ſhips of great burthen, beſides thirty eight more, together with moſt of the Spaniards conteined within them. Thoſe that got cleare of the danger, put forth to Sea, whereof ſome with a ſtrong Weſt wind were driuen into the channell of England where part of them were taken by the Engliſh, others by men of Rochel in France, and ſome arriued at Newhauen in Normandy. In ſo much, that of one hundred thirty foure ſhips, which had ſet ſaile out of Lisbone, onely fifty three returned to Spaine: of the foure Galliaſſes of Naples, but one: of the foure Gallies of Portugall, but one: and of the ninety one Gallions and great Hulkes from diuers Prouinces, onely thirty three returned, fifty eight being loſt: in briefe, there were miſſing of their whole fleet, foureſcore and one veſſels, and of the thirty thouſand ſouldiers, thirteene thouſand, fiue hundred and odde. Of priſoners taken in England, Ireland and the Low Countries were two thouſand and more. In England, Don Pedro de Valdez, Don Vaſquez de Sylua, and Don Alonzo de Sayes and others were kept for their ranſome: in Zeland, Don Diego de Piementell, and in Ireland, Don Alonzo de Lucon, Roderigo de Laſſe and others of great account: to conclude, there was no famous or worthy family in all Spaine, which in this expedition loſt not a ſonne, a brother, or a kinſman.

(225) Thus were theſe Sea-ſeruices effected: as for the Land, preparations were made throughout the Kingdome, but the main forces lying encamped at Tilbury vnder the command of the Earle of Leiceſter, thither her Maieſty in perſon vpon the ninth of Auguſt repaired, full of Princely reſolution, and more then feminine courage, whoſe louely preſence and imperiall ſpeeches, as ſhee paſſed like ſome Amazonian Empreſſe through all her Army, were ſo acceptable and gratious, that Her ſouldiers, full-fraught with manly ſpirit, yet receiued an acceſſe of hardineſſe from ſo alacrious a patterne in their Mayden Queene: and they perceiued ſo well the loue of their Prince, and ſhee ſaw what it was to haue the loue of her ſubiects, that the harmony of both their affections was admirable, both of them profeſſing reſolution, and willing to ſacrifice their liues in that moſt rightfull quarrell. But the God of Hoſts hauing now preuented their forwardneſſe, without loſſe of Engliſh bloud, eſt-ſoones the Campe was diſſolued: and not long after Leiceſter ended his dayes, hauing been a Peere of great eſtate, but lyable to the common deſtiny of moſt Great ones, whom all men magnifie in their life time, but few ſpeake well of after their death.

Earle of Leiceſters death.

(226) The Land thus deliuered by the arme of the Omnipotent, and the Bore put backe that ſought to lay Englands fayre vine-yeard waſte, Queene Elizabeth (who euer held ingratitude a Capitall ſinne, but eſpecially towards her Almighty protectour) commanded ſolemne thankes-giuing to bee celebrated vnto the Lord God of Hoſts, at the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls in Her chiefe City of London, which acordingly was done vpon Sunday the eight of Sceptember, where eleuen of the Spaniſh Enſignes (the once badges of their brauery, but now of their vanity) were hung vpon the lower battlements of that Church, as palmes of praiſe for Englands deliuerance; a ſhew no doubt more acceptable to God, then when their ſpread colours did ſet out the pride of their ſhippes, threatning the bloud of ſo many innocent and faithfull Chriſtians.

Queene Elizabeths thankfulneſſe to God.

(227) the next day, the Faire being kept in Southwarke, theſe faire flagges were ſpread vpon London Bridge to the great ioy of the beholders, and eternall memory of Spaniſh purpoſes, as irreligious as vnproſperous. But the ſolemne day aſſigned to be kept holy throughout the land, was the nintenth of Nouember, being Tueſday, which accordingly was then done, and would to God had ſo continued ſtil, being no leſſe for our deliuerance, then was that Purim for the Iewes, which they inſtituted to be kept holy throughout their generations.

Eſter. 9. 26.

(228) Queene Elizabeth therefore, to bee her ſelfe an example vnto others, vpon the Sunday following, being the foure and twentieth of Nouember, repayred from the Pallace of White-Hall in Weſtminſter, through the ſtreets of London in great Eſtate: and came accompanied with her Nobility vnto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where diſmounting from her Chariot at the Weſt-dore, ſhee humbled her ſelfe vpon her knees, and with great deuotion audibly praiſed God, acknowledging him her onely Defender, who had thus deliuered the land from the rage of the enemy. And after the Sermon ended, wherein none other Argument was handled, but onely of prayſe and glory to bee rendred rendred vnto God; her Maiesty her selfe with most princely and Christian speeches exhorted all the people to their due performance of those religious seruices of thankfulnesse vnto God, like vnto another Iosuah, Dauid, and Iosias. The Zelanders also to leaue a Memoriall of their no lesse gratitude to God, then faithfulnesse to the Queene, caused a new Coyne of siluer to bee stamped, hauing on the on side the Armes of their Country engrauen, with this inscription, Glory to God alone, and on the other side, the portracts of great ships, vnder-stiled, The Spanish Fleet, and in the circumference, It came, went, and was, Anno 1588. Wherein they alluded to that quicke worke of Cæsar,  Veni, vidi, vici*, which wee haue seen also excellently described in deuise, where on the one side, the Spanish Fleet had inscribed veni, the Sunne (the eye of the whole world) vidi, and the English Nauy, vici. In other coines also were stamped ships fleeting, & sinking, and in the reuerse, Supplicants vpon their knees, with this Motto, Man proposeth, God disposeth, 1588. To the like effect also the Hollanders stamped the remembrance of this Armado in their monies, after the example of the Ancient, whose vse was to inscribe their victories vpon their Coines, of which kind were those with Spanish Shippes, hauing this Word, Impius fugit nemine sequente.

The Zelanders thankfulnes to God.

*I came, I saw, I conquered.

(229) Neither did the Dutch alone participate the triumph of this glorious successe, but all other Nations also congratulated the same; which vniuersall ioy being excellently expressed in this ensuing Ode, by a * Stranger of eminent Piety and Learning, and translated into all the chiefe Languages of Christendome; we will here annex the same, as the Close and Epilogue of this Tragico-Comedy, to be perpetuated vnto all ensuing posterities.

(230) The Thunderclappe of this Spanish Armoda thus past, and the inuincible vanquished, as the attempt & Issue was open to the eyes of the world, so the due consideration thereof was rooted in all true Englishe hearts; whereupon the Nobles and Commonalty being then assembled for Parliament, this course was at length thought fittest, that the proud Castilian should bee requited vpon his owne coasts. And first it was determined to aide Don Antonio the expulsed King of Portugall, whose title was apparantly farre more iust, then either Philips for England or Stukeleys for Ireland; both which Kingdomes they had in hostile manner inuaded: and this the rather was resolued on, for that the Spanish king was endeuouring to repaire his dishonour by repairing his Fleet and Forces for a new expedition against England.

An. D. 1589.

Consultations for attempts on Spaine.

Don Antonio King of Portugall flyeth to Queen Elizabeths protection.

Philip prepareth for a new expedition.

(231) This Don Antonio among other Competitors claimed the Crowne of Portugall after the decease of King Henry, as sprung from king Emanuel by his sonne Don Lewis the Infant; but alleaged by the Philippians to haue been his Bastard. Against which accusation Don Antonio had sentance for his legitimation by the Bishoppe of Angra, and euery way sought to rubbe off that scandalous imputation. His conditions were such as well befitted a Crown, he being a Prince of greater spirit then person, and yet of rare modesty and humility, seasoned with a disposition very deuout and religious, whereby hee came to bee in farre better fauour and esteeme then Philip of Spaine; for which cause hee was first made Defender of the Realme by the Gouernours, and afterwards accepted King by the people, whereto he was in a manner enforced, seeing himselfe enuironed with many drawn swords in midst of a furious multitude.

Don Antonio his Title.

His conditions.

(232) But Philip as more ambitious, so more strong in men and munition, made warre into Portugall, and by his Generall, Duke Alba, put this new King vnto flight; after which fortune, himself enters Portugall, where hee proclaimed eight hundred thousand Crownes to him that could bring him Don Antonio either aliue or dead. But such was their loue vnto this vnfortunate Prince, that eight moneths hee kept in Portugall disguised, and had conuersation and conference with many, yet was neuer betraied; but not able to hold vp his side, the Gouernours (as is the fashion of the world) dayly falling to his stronger, after many conflicts, and much lamenting their miserable estate, left the Spaniard (who then gaped for nothing but Kingdomes to possesse the Gouernment of Portugall.

K. Philip attempts the Crowne of Portugall.

Portugall possessed by the Spaniard.

(233) Antonio's kingly stile thus ended before it was throughly begunne; Philip had subiections offered him auie, and in such sort, as some that seemed Competitors, yeelded him their rights, among whom Katherina Dutchesse of Braganza was one: yea and Pope Gregorie himselfe (with the Prior of Crato) who had hitherto sided wit Don Antonio, knowing it was surest to hold with the strongest, sent Philip his Apostolicall allowance, the better to put on his New-gotten Crowne; exhorting him to thankfulnesse, for these his prosperities; & mouing him earnestly to make warre against England, with proffers of assistance as we haue said.

(234) Don Antonio thus driuen out of his Kingdome, for succour repaired vnto the Court of France; where, of the Queene Mother, a pretended Competitor for the Portugall Crown, he was both fauoured and aided at Seas for the Isles of Terceres: but such was his destiny in his Sea-fights also (the Peruan gold being no lesse powerful then the Spanish Canons) that eight of the tallest French Ships were lost, & two thousand men slaine; among whom was the Lord Philip Trossy the Generall, whose death was so Taken, and the expedition so censured, as the Portugal Captaines were reputed for Cowards, imprisoned in France, and many of them charged with corruption and treason; so that all his hopes were now in the wane, and no further assistance could be expected of the French.

King Antonio seekes aide from France.

His losses at sea.

(235) The poore Prince thus deiected in France, knowing the vniuersall report of Queene Elizabeths great fame, obtained leaue of her Maiesty for access vnto her sacred presence, whose Court had euer been a famoused Sanctuary to all oppressed Princes, or distressed Estates: where shewing his right to the Portugall Crowne, and clearing the obiections touching his Bastardy (which imputation in sundry languages he refuted in Print to the publike view of the world) receiued now comfort to bee set in his kingdome

K. Antonio repaires for aid to Q. Elizabeth.

Kingdome, England hauing ſo iuſt an occaſion to warre againſt Spaine. Among whom once more he aſſayed to try the fauour of Fortune; his Petition to the Queene being onely this, that ſhe would but land him ſafe in his Country, & amongſt his owne People, of whoſe aſſured loue and readineſſe to receiue him as their King, and thence forward to defend him and his iuſt Title, hee nothing doubted. So honeſt and reaſonable a ſuit could not but finde fauour with ſo gracious a Queene: whereupon prouiſion being made for the Portugall voyage, he embarked at Plimouth in Aprill, whence ſixe of the Queens ſhippes, and twenty more of warre (beſides many other ordained for tranſportation) ſpred their Sailes vnder the conduct of the euer-feared Sir Francis Drake, and the moſt valorous Sir Iohn Norris Generall for the land ſeruice, with eleuen thouſand ſoldiers, and twenty fiue hundred Mariners. Theſe *landing in a Bay of Galicia, neere vnto the Groine, in their March were met and encountred within halfe a mile of the Towne, but their enemies were ſoone forced to retire vnto their Gates.

Succours are afforded him.

A.D.1589. The Portugall voyage.

*Ex Winkfeild. April.20.

(236) The next day General Noris hauing viewed the aduantage, reſolued to attempt the place by a ſcalado, and to land ſome Artillery, to beat the ſhips and Gallies which did play vpon their troopes, which was effectually performed; and the Gallies forced to abandon the Roade, the Baſe-town was ſurpriſed, and in three ſeuerall places entred, where the Inhabitants with a great cry tooke into the high Towne, but ſome preuented, eſcaping the fury of the ſword, fledde to the Rockes, where they were found and ſlaine to the number of fiue hundred. Among theſe ſo hid, Don Iuan de Luna, a man of great command, was one, who the next morning came forth, and yeelded himſelfe to the Generals deuotion Iuan de Vera, a Commiſſary of victuals was likewiſe taken, who confeſſed that there was in the Towne three hundred thouſand Ducats of ſiluer, and order giuen for the baking of three hundred thouſand Bisket, of that the Towne was ſtored with two thouſand Pipes of wine, a thouſand Iars of Oyle, three thouſand Kintals of Beefe, a great quantity of Beanes, Peaſe, Wheat and Fiſh, and of Match and Harqueboizes three Barkes were brought thither not long before. All which (hee confeſſed) were for a new voyage againſt England. And indeed ſuch ſtore of wines was there found, as the Engliſh Souldiers vſing little moderation in drinking, did not onely lay themſelues open to danger from the vpper Towne, but by diſtemperature ſo inflamed and infected their bloud, that it cauſed a great mortality and infection in the whole Army.

The Groine ſurpriſed. Infection through intemperate drinking of wine.

(237) The Baſe-Towne thus gotten, a ſudden reſcue of two thouſand men ſo reſolutely came to the very Gates, as though no contrary power could poſſibly keepe them from entrance, but in the firſt brunt of reſiſtance, they were content to make their heeles the ſafe guardians of their heades, of whom yet many were cut ſhort by the Engliſh purſuers. With the like feare the ſhippes in the Roade were fraught, whoſe Souldiers ouercharging the great Ordinance of a great Gallion, abandoned her bord, and ſet her on fire, which for the ſpace of two daies burned in moſt terrible wiſe, ſo that of fifty great peeces but ſixteene were found whole, the reſt broken and melted, and ſo brought away by the Engliſh; but the higher towne ſtrong both by ſituation and ſufficiency for reſiſtance, reſolutely held out, onely intreated by Parley to haue faire Warres. And being built for the moſt part on a hard rocke, one place was found mineable, where the Generall the fourth day of this ſiege ſet men on worke, who bedded their powder ſomwhat too ſhort of the wall, whereby that deſigne tooke not the ſuppoſed effect. But this error reduced, another as great was committed, for the Miners againe ſet on worke, came right vnder the Wall, but ſomwhat wide of a great Tower thereupon built, ſo that when the blaſt of powder brake forth, it ouerthrew but a part of the ſame, and left the other ſtanding tottering and ſhaken, which being not reguarded, in the heat of aſſault fell ſuddenly vpon the Engliſh, and ſlew Captaine Sydenham with thirty Souldiers beſides, to the great aſtoniſhment of the reſt there imployed, not knowing the cauſe whereof it came, but rather ſuſpecting it a Strategem of the Towne; and the reſt of the rubbiſh lay ſo looſe vnder foot, that the Aſſaulters could haue no ſure ſtanding to make their fight.

The Enemy put to flight.

(238) Whiles theſe things were in doing, the Generall had certaine notice that the Conde de Andrada had aſſembled an Army of eight thouſand ſtrong, which was but the beginning of another more ſtrong, leuied vnder the Conde de Altemira; the former, not paſſing ſixe miles off, and both of them intending the reſcue of the Groine: To preuent which, Sir Iohn Norris with nine Regiments *met them, and preſently fell to a hote skirmiſh, whoſe brunt the enemy not able to endure, tooke ouer a Bridge, built vpon a Creeke of the Sea, at the further foot whereof their Campe lay verry ſtrongly entrenched. Sir Edward Norris, Colonell Sydney, the Captaines Hinder, Fulford, and Barton entred the Bridge, whoſe further end was barricaded with Barrels, where comming to puſh of pike and ſword, Sir Edward was grieuouſly hurt in the head, Captaine Hinder receiued fiue wounds in the head and face by the Sword; Captaine Fulford hurt in the left arme with a ſhot, and Captaine Barton hurt in the eye. Notwihſtanding, the Generall ſo ſeconded the encounter, as the Guard was ouerthrowne, and the whole Army put into rout, of whom our men had the Chaſe fully three miles in foure ſundry wayes. What the ſlaugher was, is vncertaine, but ſuppoſed to bee great; beſides others that were found hid in Vineyards and hedges, and two hundred put to ſword that had taken into a Cloiſter. In this ſeruice the Kings Standard was taken, ſome plate and rich apparrell found in their Campe, and the Country for three Miles compaſſe ſet on flaming fire; the Generall making his retreat with the Kings Colours and Armes diſplaied before him, to the great honour of the Engliſh.

The enemy encountred.

The Engliſh are victorious.

(239) Thus returning vnto the Groine, and wanting Cannons to batter the walles, the Engliſh fitted the Baſe-Towne, embarked from thence, and put againe to Sea. But the windes being contrary, many aſſaies were made before the Fleet could recouer the Burlings, in which paſſage Robert Earle of Eſſex, with M. Walter Deuereux his brother, accompanied with others, *came to the Fleet; which Earl hauing put himſelfe into the Iourney againſt the opinion of the world, or well-liking of the Queene, ſeemed vnto the Sager ſort to hazard his fortunes; but other more ſtirring ſpirits, held it the great aduancement of his reputation; whereof I thinke I may ſay, as Tacitus ſaid of Veſpaſians employment in Britaine, That there was laid the firſt foundation of his future eſteeme.

(240) The Fleete thus encreaſed, they landed in Portugall, euen vnder ſhot of the Caſtle of Peniche, where the Sea growing high, many were in perill of drowning; for moſt of them waded to the waſt for the Shoare. Of this Towne and peece, Conde de Fuentes had the command; who with fiue Companies of Spaniards ſallied out againſt the Engliſh, and made their approach cloſe to the Sea-ſide; whereupon the Earle of Eſſex, with S^r Roger Williams diuided their men into two Troupes, the one keeping the Sands along the Shoare, and the other ouer the ſand-hills made towards the in-land. Which the enemy ſeeing, haſted to the encounter, and came vnto fight, euen within puſh of Pike; but were ſo entertained, as they had no great liking, but preſently turned their backs, and fled further then the Engliſh had reaſon to follow. The Towne they left vndefended, of that it was entred without any reſiſtance, resistance, and the Castle summoned the same night; the Captain whereof was Antonio de Aurid, a Portugall, who demanding, and being satisfied, that Don Antonio was present, gaue vp the peece, with the munition therein. Vnto this place some Fryers & other poore of the Country, came to welcome their King, promising him (in the name of the rest) a sufficient supply both of horse and foote, which notwithstanding was neuer performed.

The attempt for Lisbone.

(241) Here it was thought fitte that the wounded and sicke should remaine, with sufficient prouision, and seauen companies of foot to guard the ships and Castle; and the maine Army to march ouer land vnto Lisbon, the Metropolitane of Portugall, accounted the strongest Fort in the World, and whosoeuer held that, might (in their esteeme) make head against the mightiest Monarch in the Earth; whither likewise Sir Francis Drake (Generall of the Sea-seruice) promised to come, if the iniury of weather did not hinder him. The March vndertaken, Torres Vedras made some shew of resistance, but presently vpon the approch of the English, that Castell was abandoned, and left to the possession of Don Antonio; whose hopes hereupon beganne to enlarge, thinking the whole would stand for his claime; but therein was not a little deceiued; for victuals growing scarse in the Army, the Country did not supply them according to expectation, neither came in any of strength. Notwithstanding the English Army from Vedras marched to San Sebastian, thence to Lores, and lodged the fift day at Aluelana, three miles from Lisbon, where many of their Souldiers perished by drinking in two places of poisoned standing waters, as also in eating of honey, purposely left in the houses, and spiced with poison, as it was thought.

Spanish history.

The English approch Lisbon.

(242) The fiue and twentieth of May, the English Army came vnto Lisbon, whose Suburbes were found abandoned, houses of prouision for corne & victuals fired, and none left to defend but a sort of olde folkes and beggars, crying in the streetes, Viua el Rey Don Antonio and about midnight they within the Towne set fire on their houses that stood within vpon the wal. The English wearied with the six daies march, want of victual, the last nights watch and many of them weake, were desirous of rest; where the enemy hauing aduertisement, in the dead of the night sallied out of the Town; and made their assault in three seuerall streets, but chiefly vpon Colonell Brets Quarters, who being at rest (as most of the Army were) with what hast was possible, put himselfe, and his in Armes, & so throughly made head, that he was slaine in the place, Captaine Carre with the like resistance and valour ended his life; Captaine Carsey wounded to Death; Captaine Caue hurt, but not mortally. The others found not their attempts so easie, but were put to a suddaine and foule retreat; insomuch as the Earle of Essex (full of high spirit, and hot youthly bloud) had them in chase to the very gates of the high town and (as it was truly reported) the enemies losse did triple the English, aswell in quantity, as in men of quality.

A Sally on the English.

Essex pursueth the enemy to the very Gates.

(243) Mean while Generall Drake with his whole Fleete was come to Cascais, and possessed the towne without any resistance, for the inhabitants at the discouery of his Nauie, fledde with bagge and baggage into the mountaines, which the Generall perceiuing, sent vnto them a Portugall Pilote, to offer them all peaceable kindnesse, so as they would accept of their rightfull King, and minister necessaries to the Army which he had brought. Which offer the ioyfully embraced, and presently sent two chiefe men of the Towne, to signifie their loyalty to Don Antonio, and their honest affection to his Army, whereupon Sir Francis immediately landed his Companies, but not without perill of the Castell, which being guarded by the Spaniards, held out against him for their King.

Drake surprised Cascais.

(244) At Lisbone the Portugals had promised to aid Antonio, with three thousand horse, besides other supplies from the Duke of Braganza, Don Francisco de Toledo, & others, at a day prefixed, and now altogether past, by reason (as it seemeth) that the Spaniards hauing chiefe command in al places, they were vnable by any meanes to make head. Whereupon the vnfortunate Antonio seeing the time expired, & but forty horse come, nor of foot sufficient to furnish two Ensignes, grew almost hopelesse, yet assaied hee to perswade a stay before Lisbon for 9. dayes more: but the Towne being strong, and the English declining (for there was the first apparant shew of sicknesse among them) the Portugals backward, and of base resolutions, ready to obey any so themselues may be rich: and the Generall hauing already done more then was promised, lest they should hazard the honour which hitherto had been gotte, denied his request, and gaue present order to return to Cascais, himselfe, the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams remaining with the stand, that was made in the high street, till the whole Army was drawn into the field: at which time, the King (euen herein of kingly disposition towards his Natiues) made request to saue the suburbes, from spoile; which if the English had ransacked, they had beene the richest Army that euer returned to England. But now ready to depart Lisbon, the noble Essex in the courage of his Martiall bloud, ranne his speare and brake it against the Gates of that City: demanding alowd, if any Spaniard mewed therein, durst aduenture forth in fauour of his Mistresse to break a staffe with him. But those Gallants thought it safer to court their Ladies with amorous discourses; then to haue their loues written on their breasts with the point of his English Speare.

Don Antonio his Princely compassion.

(244) Being now come to Cascais, intelligence was brought by a Fryer, that the enemy was marched vnto Saint Iulina with a strong power to encounter the English, vnto whose Generall, the Generall Norris sent a Trumpet, promising to meete him the next morning if hee durst abide his comming, and withall gaue him the lie: the Earle of Essex also sent him a particular Cartell, offering himselfe against any of theirs, if they had any of his quality, or else sixe eight or tenne, to trie single combate, whereat this Spaniards combe was so cut, as in the night, before battell, in great feare and perturbation hee dislodged, and returned to Lisbon, not answering the Challenge, but threatning to hang the Messenger, who followed him euen to the very Gate. Then was the Castle of Cascais rendred vpon condition, that the men of Armes should depart with bag and baggage; which peece in part, by the Order of the Generall, was blowne vp by mine. During which time threescore Hulkes laden with Corne, Masts, Cables, Copper, and Waxe, being the Spanish Kings prouision were taken going to Lisbon.

The Castle of Cascais rendred.

Sixty Spanish Hulkes taken.

(245) The English hauing thus farre proceeded, put againe to Sea, when, vnlooked for, and in a great calme, nine Gallies fell in the winde of their Fleete, and so plaide vpon a straggling Barke of Plimouth, that Captaine Caluerly, his Lieutenant, the Master, and some of the Marinars, abandoning the vessell, betooke them to their Boates, whereof one, (in which the Captaine and Master were) was ouerrunne by the Gallies, and they both drowned. Two other Hulkes also straggling from the Fleete, were set vpon by the Spaniards; in one of which, Captaine Minshaw fought to the last, and very valiantly after his ship was on fire; but whether fired by himselfe or the enemy, could not be iudged; the calme being so still, as no succour could be sent from the fleete, to their great griefe.

(246) Thus continuing seuenteene daies on board, many of the dead souldiers were cast into the Sea; and the whole now consisted of two thousand men, who comming to Vigo, found euery street fenced with a strong Barricadoe, and but only one man in the Towne, the Inhabitants making toward Bayon

as fast as they could driue; then was both the Towne and all the Countrey for seuen miles campasse set on a flame. Which seruice thus performed, Sir Francis Drake with the Queenes Ships safely * arriued at Plymouth, and vpon the second of July following, arriued Sir Iohn Norris, hauing both of them performed the parts of worthy Generals.

The English arriued at Plymouth. * Iune 21.

(248) Whilest these Realmes were at variance each against others, the French were not quiet among themselues, the King somewhat voluptuous, but excessiuely prodigall towards his fauourites; the Nobility ambitious, mistrustfull, and disloyall, the Clergy turbulent, and vndutifull, bending all their force and thoughts against the Plantation of the Truth. To vnite friendship therefore, some league had been made, for confirmation whereof, the three Estates were assembled at Bloys. For the Clergy appeared one hundred thirty foure Deputies, among whom were foure Arch-bishops, one and twenty Bishops, and two Generals of Orders: for the Nobility came one hundred and fourescore Gentlemen, and for the third Estate an hundred fourescore and eleuen Deputies, all of them Lawyers and Merchants. Vpon the first sitting, and before these best wits of France, King * Henry made a solemne Oration to perswade vnion, full of liuely affection, true magnanimity, and pregnant reasons, deliuered with such an admirable eloquence and grace, as it rauished the eares of all present, besides the opening of the propositions; the which, Mantelon, the keeper of the Seale, for him further prosecuted: after him, Reynauld de Beaulme, Archbishop of Bourges, Patriarke and Primate of Aquitaine, spake in the same argument: and lastly, Michell Marteau, Prouost and President for the third Estate, confirmed, and consented to all that had been said. Whereupon an Oath of vnion was taken, to binde the King, them, and all their Posterities, the fundamentall Lawes and liberties of France onely reserued.

An oth of Vnion in France.

(249) This notwithstanding, the Leaguers, to hit the marke whereat they aymed, daily diuulged and buzzed the French Kings disgraces, and all to install the Guize in his Throne; the Papists wrongs were grieuously expostulated, their Churches burnt, and Altars profaned, the People oppressed with impositions and Subsidies; Places of Iudgement set to sale, and spirituall Benefices to him that would giue most: the Offices at Court, they alleaged, were managed by men of meane ranke; the Noblemens seruices neglected, and vnrewarded. All these, and more, were complained of, and all to make the King base in the Peoples eye, the Guize himselfe the while temporizing with both, as disswading the King to subiect his authority vnto their complaints, and at the same present perswading the other, to be vehement in their pursuites.

The Guizians practises.

(250) Among their other practises, one was against the King of Nauarre; whom the Clergy condemned for an Heretike, the chiefe (as they termed him) of the relapse; excommunicated and depriued him of the Gouernment of Guienne, and of all other dignities, as being vnworthy of successions of Crownes or Realmes. But Henry, with Festus thought it vnreasonable, to condemne this Prince without hearing, and therefore desired to haue him againe summoned, and againe to be sworne to the Vnion.

A.D.1588. Nouemb. 4.

(251) To this motion was answered, that the Cardinal of Bourbon his vncle had once obtained absolution for him; that the Queene mother had many times assayed to winne him, many learned Doctors had beene sent to reclaime him: but all in vaine. For, from the Cradle (said they) hee hath beene brought vp in this new Heresie, hath beene condemned by the Councell of Trent, receiued againe into grace by the Consistory, is againe fallen into the error which he abiured, and is now an Heretike, relapsed, vnworthy of obedience, vnworthy of respect, and vnworthy to be prayed for: for the holy See of Rome hath declared him a Schismatike, excommunicated him as incapable of succession, and therefore must the Estates of France ratifie the Popes sentence; and King Henry must thereunto subscribe, if not, the Duke of Guize, who was Master of the Castle, and carried the keyes at his owne girdle, would dissolue the Assembly, and lay all the blame vpon his Maiesty.

(252) Thus then (by the purpose of man) the first Prince of the bloud, and the onely remainder, after so many sisters and cousens of Anion, Alencon, Eureux, Berry, Bourgoyne, Angolesme, and Orleans, and which onely succeeded that of Valois, was now depriued of the succession which Nature gaue him, without calling, or hearing of his iustifications.

Henry King of Nauarre pronounced incapable of the Crown of France.

(253) To further this Guizian enterprize, his followers buzd into the heads of the multitude, that it was the Kings Climacteticall yeere, and so many presumptions were obserued, as it was told the King in plaine termes, that the Duke of Guize would surprize him. Whereupon, hauing remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigour of reuenge, and the mildnesse of his owne disposition; at last, by the lightening, supposing a thunder-clap would follow, he sought timely to preuent the danger, by taking away his life, that intended the blow. Which was not so secretly carryed, but that the designe was discouered, and a scrowle laid vnder Guize his Napkin as he sate at dinner, wherein it was written, that his life was in danger: but hee, as one confident in his owne power, wrote in the same scrowle these words, they dare not; and threw it from him vnder the Table. Other aduertisements he had, (if we may beleeue the additions of Serres) from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine, and Sauoy, that a bloudy Catastrophe should dissolue this Assembly, their Almanackes had obserued it, and it was generally predicted for Saint Thomas day.

(254) But the Duke bearing himselfe bold vpon his owne greatnesse, neglected all motiues, and very presumptuously spake to the King, complayning that the affaires of France inclined from bad vnto worse, vncurable, and almost growne desperate, wherefore, the charge he had receiued, hee would againe giue vp, and retire into the Countrey, lest other mens sinnes should be imputed his.

(255) The King, who had resolued on his death, gaue him good words, with promise of amendment what in him lay, and held him with familiar discourses, and fauourable countenance, vntill a fit time should be offered; which was the three and twentieth of December, when the Lords sitting in Councell, and entring consultation, the Guize was called for vnto the King, who as he lifted vp the Tapestry into his Cabinet, was charged vpon by the Guard, and with their Swords & Partizans presently slaine; the King auouching, that thence-forth hee would rule alone. And not long after, the Cardinall of Guize, brother to the Duke, dranke of the same Cup, at the commandement of the King.

John Serres.

(256) This death of the Guize and Cardinall, caused the King to be exceedingly hated of the Papals, whose Preachers branded his reproaches in their Pulpits, incensing the People to open rebellion, and as Furies of Hell heaped an Iliade of curses vpon the heads of the Executioners. In Paris the Kings furniture, and in the Lowre his Pictures were broken, his Armes beaten downe, his Images dragged through the streetes, his great Seale defaced, and his royall name blurred with many opprobrious termes. Yea, and the Colledge of Sorbon as forward as any, concluded by a publike * Act, That the people of France were free from the Oath of Obedience & Fealty, which they stood ingaged in vnto Henry of Valois, that lawfully, and with a good conscience they might arme themselues against him, receiue his reuenewes, and imploy it in their warres for his ouerthrow.

dable exploits in Hungary against the Turkes, at Iarnac against the Proteſtants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour, at Vimorry, and at other places; in a word, ſuch were the inteſtine troubles of France, as the King ſent for Henry King of Nauarre, to helpe quench the flames of ciuill ſedition, which were mounted ſo high, as that the Leaguers preuailed againſt the Lords of Parliament, prophaned Churches, violated Virgins, and defiled their Chriſtian profeſſion with ſtreames of bloud. And to fill vp the meaſure of their impious iniquity, a Iacobin Frier, by name Iames Clement, when the King had beſieged Paris, (the head City of this rebellion) made vowes to kill the Tyrant (as hee tearmed him) to free that holy City from Senacheribs ſiege; with which reſolution he went to Doctor Bourgoine, Priour of his Couent, and imparted this damnable proiect to him, to Father Commolet, to other Ieſuites, and to the heads of the League, all of them incouraging him to this Diuelliſh deſigne, with promiſe of Abbeyes and Biſhoprickes, if he eſcaped, and if he dyed in the action, to be made a Martyr, and haue place in Heauen aboue the Apoſtles.

(258) Thus furniſhed with bleſſings for this curſed act, vpon the firſt of Auguſt the Monke went to Paris, and had priuate acceſſe to the King to deliuer a Letter, pretending ſome matter of importance; but as the King read it, the Diabolicall Inſtrument with a Knife from his ſleeue, wounded him in the bottome of his belly, and there left the knife, which the King drew forth, and with the ſame ſtrucke this Iacobine aboue the eye: their ſtrugling being heard, many haſtily came in, who ſeeing the King wounded, and all in goare bloud, in their rage ſtabbed the Monſter to death, and not many dayes after, King Henry dyed of the wound.

(259) Whereupon Charles Cardinall of Bourbon, a younger brother to Anthony King of Nauarre, and vncle vnto Henry then the preſent King, was proclaimed Lieutenant Gouernour, yea, and gold and ſiluer coyned with his picture and ſtile of Charles the tenth, King of France. Howbeit, Henry King of Nauarre was proclaimed of the Army, whoſe right was before that Papall Prelates, and whom the laſt Henry by his laſt will ordained to be his Succeſſor. Notwithſtanding onely in reſpect of his Religion, being a profeſſed Proteſtant, the Leaguers made ſuch head againſt him, that hee was enforced to ſue vnto that Generall Sanctuary of Princes, Queene Elizabeth for her aide, who euer fauouring the progreſſe of the Goſpell, and knowing Nauarres claime to be aboue all other (of that Nation) for the French Crowne, and that the Spaniard was ſetting foot into France: firſt, ſent him twenty thouſand pound ſterling, with Powder, Munition for warre, and certaine ſhippes alſo to ſerue at his command; and cauſing a generall muſter to be taken in moſt of the Shires in England, ſent foure thouſand Souldiers furniſhed, from euery of them into France; to which ſeruice the Citizens of London ſet forth a thouſand very well appointed, and ſeruiceable men: the Generall of all which Forces, was the noble Peregrine Barteu Lord Willoughby: whoſe want ſhee again ſupplyed with three thouſand foote, which were ſent into Britaine, vnder the conduction of Sir Iohn Norris, that ſonne of Mars: theſe ioyning with the Prince Dombes, Lord Generall of that Prouince, performed many worthy exploits for the French King.

(260) But Parma being entred France, and the * Pope with his Cardinals fulminating his Excommunication againſt Henry, and his adherents: Queene Elizabeth (who neuer was daunted with ſuch flaſhes) ſent into France Robert Earle of Eſſex, for her Lieutenant Generall ouer foure thouſand Footmen, and two hundred Horſe, (beſides many Pyoners) all of them to bandy for the King againſt his enemies the Leaguers. The Earle, though young, yet full of valour, was followed with many voluntary Gentlemen, whoſe countenances well ſhewed the courage of their hearts: Theſe landing in Normandy, laide ſiege vnto the ſtrong Roan, in aſſault whereof his brother Walter Deuereux was ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot, to the exceſſiue griefe of the Earle, and others, being a Gentleman trayned vp, both by Academicall and Marſhall education, vnto very great hopes and expectation.

(261) But King Henry finding many rubs in his way, the Leaguers ſtill increaſing their ſtrengths from Rome and Spaine, and the Crowne of France laid at ſtake for him that threw moſt, thought it good policy (though proued to him in the end diſaſterous and fatall) to temporize with the predominating faction; and therefore leauing the Religion wherein he had been bred, fell to that of Rome, which euer till then hee had reſiſted, and after great ſuite made to the Pope, was laſtly abſolued by the Holy Father, who heaped whole ſtreames of bleſſings vpon his ſacred head, himſelfe ſwearing to defend the Romiſh faith againſt all impugners: ſo that now all ſides ſatisfied, without contradiction; Henry of Nauarre was crowned King of France. Onely the Spaniards were vnwilling to leaue that faire Countrey, fortified in Britaine vpon the Riuer, ouer againſt Breſt; whence after much ſlaughter, Generall Norris forced them, though with the loſſe of ſome Engliſh, and life of Captaine Furbiſher, Commander of the Fleet.

A.D.1593. Iuly 25.

(262) The Leaguers not liking Nauarres aduancement, miſtruſting that his conuerſion was fained, and temporary, as being but a ſtep, the eaſier to mount the Royall Throne: by treaſon laid waite for his life, and croſt what they could his countenance at Rome; whileſt the Spaniards imployed all their wits for the worrying of France, and ſo farre perſiſted in their deſignes, as King Henry by Proclamation denounced warre againſt Spaine, and Philip in like manner proclaimes warre againſt France; in which ſtate they ſtood, during the life of Erneſtus Archduke of Auſtria, brother in Law and Nephew vnto King Philip, whoſe Gouernour hee then was in the Low-Countries.

Warres proclaymed betwixt France and Spaine.

(263) After whom ſucceeded his brother Albertus the Military Cardinall, and Arch-duke of Auſtria, who no ſooner was made Gouernour in place of his Brother, but that hee prepared againſt the French and Vnited Eſtates: and to make his aſſayes, he firſt began with Callis, a thing long before proiected by others in his place; that Towne being Sea-port of great importance, as the Engliſh found it whileſt it was theirs, and the loſſe thereof great, as Queene Mary and her wiſe Statiſts both tooke it, and felt it.

Callis ſurprized.

(264) At this time the Garriſon was ſmall, and the Gouernour negligent, vndiſcreet, and vnfortunate, though hauing notice from Netherland, that the Spaniard meant her ſiege; ſo that Richbanke left vnmanned, and in great ruine, was entred vpon by the Cardinall, and ſuch as reſiſted, driuen into the Towne; where, with the Inhabitants hee grew to a compoſition for the ſurrender, Vyſdoſſein the Gouernour neuer interpoſing therein.

A.D.1596.

(265) Callis thus turning Spaniſh, and the Spaniards ſtill intending for England, Elizabeth ſollicited the French King, and proffered her aid for recouery of that Peece; but he empoueriſhed by warre, ſought to regaine his loſſes rather by ſome faire conditions of peace, then to depend vpon the dependancies and hazard of Armies: at which reſolution, our Noble Senobia was nothing well pleaſed, and therefore to preuent the practiſes of Spaine, began to make good againſt them, and prepared another expedition to Sea. But dealing more Prince-like then Philip had done by her (who made faireſt pretence of peace, when he was hoteſt in preparing warre) ſhee cauſed to bee publiſhed and Printed a Declaration of the iuſt cauſes mouing her to ſet forth her Nauy, for the defence of her Realme, the Tenor whereof wee thinke not ~~vnfit to~~ be here inſerted.

tion shall come to be read or heard, greeting: we Robert, Earle of Essex and Ewe, Vicount Hereford, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Bourchier, and Louaine, &c. and Charles Lord Howard, Baron of Effingham, Lord High Admirall of England, &c. Having the charge of a Royall Navy of Ships, prepared and sent to the Seas, by the most excellent Princesse, the Lady Elizabeth, Queene of England, France, and Ireland, &c. doe give all men knowledge, that the said Navy under our charge is by her Maiesty prepared, and sent to serue on the Seas, for defence of her Maesties Realmes, Dominions, and Subiects, against such mighty Forces as wee are aduertised from all parts of Christendome, to bee already prepared by the King of Spaine, and by further prouisions of men and shippes daily sent for, are to bee mightily increased, to inuade her Maesties Realmes, as heretofore in the yeere of our LORD, 1588 was attempted, (euen when there was a Treaty continued by both their Commissioners for a Peace) with a greater Army then euer before in his time was set to Seas: though by Gods goodnesse, and the valiance and wisedome of her Noble and faithfull Subiects, the same was notably made frustrate. And because her Maiesty hath good intelligence of perfect amity with all Kings and Princes of Christendome, sauing with the King of Spaine, who hath this many yeeres most vniustly professed openly great enmity by diuers actions, both against her royall Person, and her People, and Countries, without any iust cause first giuen on her Maesties part: Therefore we the said Earle, and Lord Admirall, doe ascertaine all persons, that we are most straitly commanded by her Excellent Maiesty, to forbeare from offending in this our voyage of any manner of Persons of what Nation soeuer, except the said Kings Naturall Subiects, or such other borne Strangers, as shall giue to the said King manifest aide with Men, Shippes, Artillery, Victuall, and other warlike prouisions for inuasion of her Maiesty. Which her Maesties commandement wee meane dutifully to obserue, and doe therefore giue straite charge to all persons, that shall serue in this Navy vnderneath vs, vpon paine of extreame punishment to obserue the same; yet to auoide all occasions that may breede question, who they are, being not the King of Spaines Subiects, that shall be charged by vs, to bee manifest ayders for the furnishing and strengthning of the said Kings Forces, prouided either by Land or Sea, to attempt any inuasion of her Maesties Countries: Wee doe for the liquidation of this doubt, earnestly in Gods name, require and charge all persons, that are not the said Kings naturall Subiects, and yet that haue giuen him aide with their shippes, victuall and munition as is aboue said, to withdraw all their said ships prepared for the warre, and all their prouisions of hostilitie out of any Hauens of Spaine or Portugall, or from the company and seruice of the Kings ships against our Navy; and therewith to returne either to their owne Countries, or if they shall like to come to our Navy, to whom, in the reuerend name of our Soueraign Lady the Queenes Maiesty, wee doe promise all Security, both for their persons and goods, to bee vsed and defended as friends, and to suffer all their Shippes and prouisions, that were taken by the King of Spaine, or intended for his seruice, or that shall be by the Owners withdrawne from his aide, to remaine in their free dispositions, so as the same bee vsed in all sorts as friends, and not as enemies to the Queenes Maiesty, and to vs her Generals: and if any shall vpon knowledge of this her Maesties most honourable Order, and of our promise (to obserue the same as fauourably as wee may) willingly and manifestly refuse to accept this our offer, and shall not endeauour themselues to performe this reasonable request, tending to their good and liberty; wee shall then bee iustly moued, as by the law of Armes wee may, to take and vse all such so refusing this our offer, as manifest aiders of the King of Spaine with forces to inuade her Maesties Dominions, and so manifest enemies: and in such case of that refusall, if any harme shall happen by any attempt against their Persons, Shippes and goods, by any our Navy, for the aiding of the said King, there shall bee no iust cause for them hereafter to complaine, or to procure their Naturall Princes and Lords to sollicite restitutions or amends for the same.

And for the more notification hereof, wee haue thought good to haue the Originall hereof to be signed with our hands, and with our Seales, to bee sent by any that will require to reade or see the same: And likewise wee haue put the same in Print, in French, Italian, Dutch and Spanish, and haue also caused the same to be distributed into as many Ports of Spaine and Portugall as conueniently might be, for the better knowledge to be had in the said Ports, as also in all other Portes vnder his subiection.

An.D.1596.

(267) These things premised, seuenteene of her Maiesties Ships Royall, three of the Lord Admirals, foure and twenty of the States shippes, Merchants, Men of Warre, and Victualers aboue one hundred, in all to the number of one hundred and fifty Saile, in the beginning of May met at Plymouth, where such Lawes were ordained for the true seruice of God, and Iustice in the Army, as it seemed rather a Regiment of Ciuill Academians, then a Rendeuow of Souldiers: and her Maiesty likewise in the Court, as Hezekiah in the Temple, opened her heart vnto the Lord in this wise.

2 Kings 19.15.

A Prayer made by Q. Elizabeth for the prospering of her Navy.

Most omnipotent Maker, and Guider of the Worlds Masse, that onely searchest and fadomest the bottome of our hearts conceits, and in them seest the true Originals of all our actions intended: thou that by thy foresight doest truly discerne, how no malice of reuenge, nor quittance of iniury, nor desire of bloud-shed, nor greedinesse of lucre, hath bred the resolution of our now-set out Army, but a heedfull care and wary watch, that no neglect of foes, nor ouer-surety of Hauen, might breed either danger to vs, or glory to them: these being the grounds wherewith thou doest inspire the minde; wee humbly beseech thee with bended knees, prosper the worke, and with best fore-winds guide the iourney, speed the victory, and make the returne the aduancement of thy glory, the triumph of their fame, and surety to the Realme, with the least losse of the English bloud. To these deuout Petitions, Lord giue thou thy blessed grant.

The English Commanders in the Fleete.

(268) The whole Fleete was commanded by Charles Lord Howard, High Admirall, shipped in the Arke-Royall, and Lord Robert Deuereux, Earle of Essex and Ewe, in the Due-Repulse, both of them iointly her Maiesties Lieutenants Generall for this seruice, by Sea and by Land. The Vice-Admirall was the Lord Thomas Howard, shipped in the Miranore; and the Rere-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, in the Warre-Spight; and for the States was Admiral, Iohn Van Duuenuoord, who serued in the Neptune, a Shippe of foure hundred Tunnes, and accordingly the whole Fleete was diuided into fiue squadrons, with a commandement that euery squadron should attend his Admirall, and euery one of these had his Vice-Admirall assigned. Of the first, was Sir Robert Southwell in the Lyon; of the second, Sir Francis Vere, in the Rainebow; the third Sir Robert Dudley, attending the Lord Thomas Howard, in the Non Pareile; the fourth, Robert Crosse, following Sir walter Rawleigh in the Swift-sure: and the last, was Iohn Gerbrantson, Vice-Admirall of the Hollanders.

The Dutch Commander.

The Vice-Admirals.

(269) For the Land-seruice besides the Generals, were Sir Francis Vere, Lord Marshall: Sir Iohn Wingfield Campe-Master Generall: Sir Coniers Clifford, Sergeant Maior, Sir George Carew, Master of the Ordinance: Iohn Bucke Prouost Marshall: Oliuer Lambert, Quarter-Master, and Roger Astley, Secretary. The Colonels of the Army were the Earle of Sussex, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrat, Sir Richard Winkfield, and Sir Edward Winkfield; of the Voluntaries, and for the Dutch, was the Count Lodowicke, in all about ten thousand Men. The priuate Councell for this expedition being selected, certaine instructions were sent sealed to euery Shippe, with a commandement to the Captaine, not to breake them open, till such time as they came to the South-Cape, vnlesse they happened to bee seuered from the Fleete by storme or mischance; but if taken by an enemy, then to cast them ouer-bord.

The voyage to Cadiz.

(270) Thus ready for Seas, vpon the first of Iune a warning Peece being shot off, all weyed Anchors, and with a gallant shew, and full sailes followed the Lord Admirall; but the wind scanting before they past Cornwall, they were enforced backe into the Sound, where staying two dayes, vppon the third, the winde came about, and with a prosperous Gale brought them to Cape Saint Vincent, where an Irish Barke was met with from Cadiz, which signified the strength of the Towne, and the shipping that lay in the Bay, to witte, twenty Gallies, ninety Sailes of Ships, whereof fiue were of those great Gallions, which are called the Kings twelue Apostles, (all doubtlesse the Sonnes of Thunder) two great Galliasses, three Frigats, three Argosies, twenty Biskaines; the rest were Merchants shippes, rich and of great burden, whose ladings were munition, coine, oyle, wine, waxe, silke, cloth of gold, and quick-siluer; some bound for the Indians, some for Britaine, some for Lisbon, and some for other places. Newes most acceptable vnto the Generals, who hasting thitherwards, vpon Sunday the twentieth of Iune, assaied at the Friery of Saint Sebastian, on the west side of Cadiz to land their men, but the place strong, and the Seas going high, their purpose was hindered.

The rich ladings of the Spanish Shippes.

(271) May I relate with hope of credite what others haue reported vpon their owne eye-sight? At the first approach of this Royall Nauy before Cadiz, a faire doue (a fortunate Presager) betimes in the morning, is said to haue lighted vpon the Mayne-yard of the Lord Admirals ship, and there to haue sate quietly the space of three howres, euery man gazing, but no man suffered to harme her: as also the last day of their departure thence, another Doue presented her self in the same manner, & in the same shippe, growing wonderfully tame and familiar with the men, and so continued with them till they came into England.

(272) The day following their approch, being the first of the weeke, the Spanish ships in the road in number fifty nine, attended with twenty Gallies by the aduise of their *Admirall, shot with the tide within the point of Maine-land, vnto Castle Puntall, and in the straites of the Baye, sorted themselues in good order, and of a reasonable distance, as well to offend the enemy, as to relieue each others interchangeably.

*Diego Sote.

(273) The Bay was narrow whereunto they had entred, full of Rockes, shelues, and sands, all which notwithstanding, it was in Councell determined, that the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Robert Southwell, with some Londoners, and a Squadron of the Low-Countrey Ships should begin the fight; which was most valiantly attempted, maintained, and continued, the thundring shot battering their bulkes, and renting their shrowdes.

The Nauall fight at Cadiz.

(274) In the heate whereof, the Earle of Essex, (in Councell appointed to keepe the Maine Battell) vpon the sudden from Port Saint Maries side, thrust himselfe formost in this Sea-fight, which the other Generall perceiuing, and the Arke-Royall too vnweldy for that narrow water, tooke into his Pinnace, and forwarded the fight to the end: Meane while the Gallies were assayled by Sir Iohn Winkfield, who with his small shippes so hanselled their sides, as they were forced to creepe by the Shoare, and so got passage at the Bridge, contrary to the expectation of the English, whose eyes were euer ayming at the fairest Marke, which indeed was the Philip, so battered with Bullets, that he began to stagger, and giue ouer fight; whose Souldiers seeking to saue themselues by water, and swimming, set this Apostle (their Admirall) on fire, by whose example, the Saint Thomas, another of Spaines Apostles, did the like, lest the English should leade them in triumph of their victory. The rest of the Spanish Fleete ranne themselues on ground in the Bay of Port Reall, to gaine some breathing time from their still following pursuers.

Charles Howard Lord Admirall.

The Spanish Admirall set on fire.

(275) These seruices thus forwarded, the Earle of Essex forth-with landed his men vnder the Block-house Puntall, about a mile West-ward from Cadiz, whence it was thought expedient to send some Regiments to the Bridge, on the West of the Iland, to impeach all succours that should come from the Maine: To which seruice were sent Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard, (now Lord Gerrard) and Sir Coniers Clifford with a power of twelue hundred strong. Meane-while the Generall Essex, with the Earle of Sussex, Count Lodowicke, Lord Harbert, Lord Burk, Sir George Carew (now Lord Carew) and others tooke towards Cadiz.

The English goe on Land.

(276) The side of their entrance was fortified with a Wall through the necke of the Promontory from Sea to Sea, and a Counters-karpe raised some distance, where were built two Bulwarkes, and a Curtaine for the stronger defence of the Towne; the enemy hauing also an aduantage from the higher ascent, played sore vpon the English to their great annoyance, insomuch that the formost began to giue backe from the Gate, which the Earle of Essex perceiuing, to engage his Souldiers resolutions, caught his owne Colours, and cast them ouer the Wall into the Towne, giuing withall a most hote assault vnto the Gate, where to saue the honour of their Ensigne, happy was hee that could first leape downe from the Wall, and with shot and Sword make way through the thickest presse of the enemy. The Towne thus surprized, the Lord Admirall hasted to second the charge, when a hote encounter ensued: for the streetes were very narrow, so as but two could march on breast, and from their flat roofed Houses, heapes of stones were tumbled downe, to the great hurt of many of the English, who neuertheless droue the enemy before them into the Market place, where the worthy Sir Iohn Winkfield, sore wounded at the Gate in his thigh, was shot with a Musket from a loope-hole of the Castle into the head, and presently dyed.

(277) But the Towne and Castle surrendred, a Proclamation was made to stay the fury of the Souldier, and the slaughter of the Spaniard, with commandement vpon paine of death, that no man should offer violence or harme to any religious person, woman, or childe. And such honourable care had the LL. Generals for the Inhabitants, that they sent them in their owne Pinnaces vnto Porto Sancta Maria; the Ladies and Gentlewomen first, who were suffered to depart in their costliest apparell, and richest Iewels: and to saue them from the spoiles, or any the least wrong of the ruder Souldiers or Seamen, the Generals themselues in persons stood at the water-sides, to see them shipped without hurt or violence.

(278) The rich Bishop of Casco being taken Prisoner, without any ransome was released, and all other of sacred Orders or Habite, suffered without touch to depart; such was the heroicall Clemency of these most Noble and truly-English Generals, to the great glory of our Nation, as the Spaniards themselues were forced to confesse. The Towne thus wonne, the spoyle thereof was giuen to the English Captaines and Souldiers, the wearing clothes of the Inhabitants onely excepted, and the Citizens compounding with the Lords Generals, to pay an hundred and twenty thousand Ducats for their ransome, were suffered to depart: for payment whereof, forty of the chiefest Citizens, Caualleroes, Clergy men, and Merchants, were brought pledges into England, till the money was paid.

by the offers they made; for no leſſe then two millions and a halfe of Ducats were offered by them for the redemption: but the L L. Generals more minding honour and the ſeruice they came for, would heare of no compoſitiō but for the Merchants ſhips onely, which whileſt it was in trauiſe to and fro, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, Admirall of Spaine, commanded them all to gether to bee ſet on fire, which was ſuddenly done: and the flames terribly mounting, forced the pitchy ſmoake, as thicke clouds to darken the Aire. Among theſe were two of the Spaniſh Apoſtles, the Mathew and the Andrew; the firſt of which was ſaued by the Lord Admirals directions, & the ſecond was quenched by Sir Thomas Gerrard, in whoſe bottome himſelfe returned for England.

The value of the Ioſſe in the Spaniſh ſhippes.

(280) Thus in an inſtant, a Fleet, ful of men, merchandize, victuall, armour, & twelue hundred peeces of Ordinance, all valued by themſelus, at twelue Millions of Ducats, was ſuddenly ſunke, conſumed or taken; the Towne alſo ranſacked, euery Souldier bringing ſom portion of her rich ſpoiles into England, to ſhew the ſeruice he performed at Cadiz. The Towne they burnt, ſauing the Churches only: the Walles they battered, and Towers demoliſhed, the Iland it ſelfe they burned, razed and ſpoiled, laying all waſte before them, and leauing the rubbiſh to declare the ruines which the Engliſh had made.

Iune. 30.

(281) Vpon the fifth of Iuly the Earle of Eſſex with his, abandoned Cadiz, the Lord Admirall being gone on boord ſome ſixe dayes before; and the next day the whole Fleet ſet ſaile weſtward towards Faro a Towne in Algarua; where the Earle deſirous to doe ſome further exploite vpon the terra firma of Spaine, landed his men (the Lord Admirall on board ſecuring the ſeas) and marching to Faro, he found it empty of men, the Inhabitants being fledde with much of their ſubſtance, and the Towne left deſtitute of victuall: yet in the Nunnery and in the Biſhoppes Palace, ſome goods were found, and in the Library Bookes valued at a thouſand Markes; and among other prizes of note, the faireſt Culuerin the King of Spaine had, was there found, and ſeaſed vpon; the Engliſh forrage the Country for 3 leagues about, and burnt the Towne Lotha without any reſiſtance.

(283) Thence the firſt of Auguſt the LL. Generals fell before the Groine, where ſeeing no ſhippes ſtirring, and the Seas altogether cleared; vpon the ſeuenth of the ſame moneth they ſafely and very richly arriued at Plimouth, to the great honour of England, glory of their Queen, and renowne of their owne valours and famous aduentures.

An other voiage at Sea.

(283) But as the wrongs offered by the Spaniards, ſeemed to the Engliſh farre greater then was yet the reuenge: ſo alſo the moſt prudent Queene held it ſtill fitte to finde King Philip more worke at home, and therefore a third voyage was vndertaken the yeere following, whereof Robert Earle of Eſſex was made as well Lord Generall for the Land, as Admirall for the ſea; hauing for the one ſeruice, his Vice-Admirall the Lord Thomas Howard, Knight of the Order, and his Rere-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Captaine of the Guard; for the other, his Lieutenant Generall was Charles Lord Mountioy Knight of the Order; his Marſhall, Sir Francis Vere Coronell Generall of the Low-Countrie Forces; Sir George Carew Lord Preſident of Munſter, Maſter of his Ordinance; and Sir Ferdinando George, Sergeant Maior of the field. The whole number conſiſted of ſixe thouſand men, beſides Mariners, for which an hundred and twenty ſhippes were furniſhed, whereof ſeuenteen were her Maieſties, ſixty men of Warre, the reſt for victuall and tranſportation. Theſe vpon the ninth of Iuly were embarked at Plimouth for the Ilands of Azores, and hauing cleared ſixty Leagues, fell fowle by a Tempeſt, and were driuen backe againe to Plimouth, and againe thence ſet ſaile vpon the 17. of Auguſt next following.

(284) Vpon the fifteenth of September they fel with the Iſles Flores, Enermes, Fyall, and Pike; al which ſubmitted themſelues to the Lord Generals deuotion; whence weying their Anchors, they made ſaile for Saint Michaels, and there before the Town caſt them againe, where it was determined that Sir Walter Rawleigh ſhould keep the ſea, whiles the Lord Generall with two thouſand ſhould land elſe where in the Iland; which they did, and ſacked the rich town Villa Franca: but the ſeas going high, and the Winter ſtormes approaching, after the ſpoile of thoſe places, the deſtruction of a Carracke richly laden with Sugars, fired by her owne men, the taking of a Braſile man, and the ſurprize of three prizes which they brought into England, valued at foure hundred thouſand Ducats, they returned, the Spaniard euery where hauing the worſt.

(285) Theſe ſtirres on the ſeas brought yet further miſchiefes on the Spaniard, by hindring the trafficke of Merchandiſe, as well for their owne trade & comerce with others, as for others trading into Spain; among whom Sigiſmond, the young and new elected King of Polonia, found himſelf moſt agreeued: whoſe Amdaſſador for that buſineſſe vnto the Queen, was one Paulus de Ialine, a Polone Gentleman, learned, eloquent, and very audacious, (if not ouer-much) who bringing * letters of credence from his King, had audience at Greenwich, her Maieſty ſitting vnder her cloth of Eſtate, and with her Nobles, attending the ſumme of his meſſage, which the Polonian beganne with more then an ordinary Grace.

Sigiſmond K. of Polonia his Ambaſſage to the Queene.

* Dated 19. of May.

(286) Whoſe tenour was filled with blaſts of diſcontent, conceiued by the potent Maſter the King of Polonia, and cauſed by the greeuances of his Merchants, who not onely were depriued of ſome priuiledges in England, but the Sea which is made free by the Omnipotent ſtopped, and the trades of his Merchants into Spaine by her Highnes Edicts debarred, cōtrary to the law both of Nature & of Nations: that his Maſter as he could not be moued to diminiſh any part of his loue towards her Maieſty, ſo yet could hee not but relieue his owne ſubiects; and the rather for that it touched all his Nobility; whoſe reuenews conſiſted chiefly vpon the Trade of Merchandizing. That hee had hitherto forborne all meanes of requite, though her Maieſty well knew, of meanes he had no want; and now had ſent to aduertiſe hir Highneſſe in a louing manner by him his Ambaſſador, ſeeing that his letters to that purpoſe hertofore ſent, had not beene regarded; in whoſe name he now required, that the ſeas might bee open, a reſtitution made, and the Trade Weſtward to Spaine free, according to equity; otherwiſe his Maſter would no longer neglect his Subiects loſſes, but would take in hand a meanes of redreſſe. As for her Maieſties wars with Spaine, that ought not to hinder Nauigation by the common Law of Nature (as hee auouched) nor for her reſpect ſhould the ancient friendſhip betwixt the potent Polonian and the mighty King of Spaine bee broken, nor with the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe daughter his Prince had now married, which bound him in a double band of loue. But hee truſted (his Maſters requeſt bearing ſuch equity) her Maieſty would regard it, and command ſatisfaction of theſe things forthwith to bee made, to the content of his Prince, & ſafety of her ſelfe; which thing hee wiſhed, & therof warned her Maieſty. And with other like words ended as peremptorily as hee beganne.

The ſumme of the Ambaſſadors Oration.

(287) Vnto which confident Oration, the Queen her ſelf not brooking to be braued by any Prince in the World, preſently made anſwere, preuentiug the Lord Chancellor therein, who was about to doe it, and both roundly and learnedly in the Latine (the ſame language wherein the meſſage was deliuered) replyed: the very words as neere as could bee taken from her mouth were theſe.

(288) Oh how was I deceiued! I looked for an Embassage, but thou hast brought me complaints; I vnderstood by thy letters that thou wert a Legate; but I find thee an Herauld, neuer since I drew breath heard I such an Oration. I maruell truly, I maruell at so great and such vnaccustomed boldnesse in so publike an assembly; neither doe I think if the King thy Master were present, that hee would say so much: but if peraduenture he hath committed any such thing to thy charge (which surely I do much doubt) it is to be imputed vnto him, that where the King is of yeers vnripe, and not by bloud, but by election (yea and but newly aduanced) hee doth not so perfectly vnderstand the course of negotiating these kind of affaires with other Princes, which either his Ancestors haue obserued with vs, or perhaps others will obserue, who afterwardes shall succeede him. As touching thy selfe, indeede thou seemest to me to haue read many Bookes, but not to haue perused the Bookes of Princes affaires, but vtterly to bee ignorant what is conuenient amongst Kings. And whereas thou makest mention of the Law of Nature and Nations; know, that this is the Law both Naturall and Nationall, that when Warre is waged among Princes, it is lawfull for one of them to intercept the military helpes of the other, brought from what place soeuer, so to preuent the harms which might otherwise redound on himselfe: And this againe I auow to be the Law of Nature and Nations. Whereas likewise thou mentionest a new affinity with the house of Austria, which now thou makest so famous, and of so deare esteeme, forget not Sir, that there haue beene of that house that would haue bereft the Kingdom of Polonia from thy King. As for other points which bee not to be spoken of at this place, and time, because they are many and seuerally to be considered of one after another: thou shalt wait for such further answere as shall bee resolued on by some of my Councell, to whom I will assigne the consideration of this matter: In the meane time farewell and bee quiet. And thus Lion-like rising, daunted the malepert Orator no lesse with her stately port and maiesticall departure, then with the tartnesse of her princely cheekes: and turning to the Traine of her Attendants, thus said; Gods death my Lords (for that was her oath euer in anger) I haue been enforced this day to scowre my old Latine, that hath laine long in rusting.

An Ambassador from the King of Denmarke. Sept. 7.

(289) To entreate a Peace betwixt these Christian Princes of England and Spaine, the King of Denmarke likewise did send an Ambassage vnto Queene Elizabeth, as also to deliuer the Garter worn by his Predecessor lately departed this world, with an earnest entreaty to continue the amity betwixt their two Realmes. The man was Arnald Whitfield Chancellor of Denmarke, iudicious, learned, and wise, who with farre better temper and tearmes well couched, deliuered his oration; which ended, hee most humbly propounded certain requests (wherunto her Maiesty presently replyed) which in effect were these.

The Danish Ambassadors requests.

(290) 1. That the League of peace confirmed betwixt the Crowns of England & Denmarke might be continued as formerly it had beene in the late deceased Kings dayes; & other his Predecessors, which now the present King his Master did instantly desire: To which shee answered: that she was most willing thereunto, wishing that the now-King would preserue the same amity no worse then his Predecessors had done.

2 That w he reas much Christian bloud was spilt in these continuall warres betwixt England & Spain, it would please her Maiesty to giue her consent, that the King his Master might make a motion of Peace; and as he found the occasion, so to proceed. Whereunto she replyed, that shee thought his King was too yong, and vnexperienced, to conceiue throughly the cause of breach betwixt her and Spaine; and as the League had not been broken on her part, or with her roiall consent, so an accord should not be sought after by her nor by any in her behalfe, for (quoth shee) I would haue the King of Denmarke, and all Princes Christian and Heathen to know, that England hath no need to craue Peace; nor my selfe endured one howres feare since I attained the Crowne thereof, being guarded with so valiant and faithfull Subiects.

An heroicke answere of an vndaunted Queen.

3 His third request was, if it stood with her Maiesties good liking, to permit open traffique, that the Merchants of Denmarke might transport their goods into Spain without danger on the narrow seas as heretofore some of them had sustained to their great losse. Her Maiesties answere was, that it was to her vnknowne, that any of his Masters good Subiects were in any wise molested, or their goods stayed, & that vpon iust proofe thereof made, a redresse shall be ordained, to the full satisfaction of the King and content of his Subiects.

4 Lastly, he was to returne the Gartar, (wherewith her Maiesty had honoured the late deceased King) as the manner is of forraine Princes to doe, which hee with great reuerence there deliuered; Which her Maiesty accepting; yet told him, shee was right sorry to receiue it, for thereby shee was put in mind of the losse of a most Noble Brother, & a most louing friend. But howsoeuer the Danish Merchants now complained of losse, the English Marchandize were arrested in the Sound, for release whereof, Ambassadors were sent into Denmarke, where a restitution was made by the King, with such honour and bounty, as well satisfied her Maiesty, and contented her Merchants.

Tir-Oens rebellion in Ireland.

(291) But a more dangerous Agent, working for Spaine, was the Irish Tir-Oen, who serpent-like lay lurking vpon his aduantage to raise the Standard of Rome, and to diuert subiection from the English Crowne. This mans fortunes wee haue formerly declared, how being the sonne of a Bastard, and a banished fugitiue, he was raised by her Maiesties* meer bounty to the dignity of an Earle, and stood in authority ranked with the best; nor so onely, but being twice in danger of capitall crimes (once for a murther, next for vsurping the Title of O-Neale) vpon better hopes of her princely clemency, twice got pardon for his life. The times now dangerous, and Ireland too ready to receiue forraine powers, it was thought conuenient to imply Sir Iohn Norris (that famous Warriour) into those parts, with thirteene hundred of the Netherland old Souldiers, newly retired from the wars in Britaine.

* See Cambdens Brit. in Ireland.

Sir Iohn Norris sent into Ireland.

(292) Hugh Baron of Dungannon, now Earle of Tir-Oen, fearing lest the English would make their nests where himselfe meant to build, namely in some Castle at the mouth of Lough-Earne, suddenly assailed the fort of Black-water, by which the entry lay into his Country, and got it by surrender. Which done, done, he wrote to Kildare, to side with him against his wrongs receiued of the Lord Deputy; yea and at the same instant, to Sir Iohn Norris (appointed Lord Generall) that hee might mildly be dealt with, and not be driuen headlong vpon the dangerous rockes of disloialty.

Tir-Oens first flying out.

(293) But how his loyalty stood affected vnto her Maiesty (his railer) was well perceiued by the powers which he retained about him, being alwaies guarded with a thousand horsemen, and sixe thousand two hundred and fourescore foot of Vlster, besides two thousand three hūdred of Conaught, which euer lay ready at his command; whereupon all of them being proclaimed Traitors; the flames of rebellion begann more violently to burst forth, which for a Long time, and not without losse of much bloud could hardly bee quenched: for though the Lord Generall were not inferiour in strength of men, yet the aduantages of the enemy were such, that the time was rather spent in taking of booties, and friuolous Parlies, then in any memorable exploit; the one part waiting for fitter opportunities, and the other looking euery day for his promised succours from Spaine.

He and his adherents proclaimed.

(294) But to spare the effusion of Christian blood Queen Elizabeth who euer minded Mercy more then Iustice, caused her Treasurer & Chiefe Iusticiar of that Kingdome, as her Commissioners to confer with this discontented Earle, and others his adherents, before whom, Tir-Oen complained of wrongs offered him by Sir Henry Bagnall Mareshall, aswell to the preiudice of his estate, as of his esteeme with the Queen, the Lord Deputy, Lord Generall, and others, and thereupon exhibited a Petition in humble manner containing these requests; That himself & all his followers might bee pardoned of their crimes, and bee restored to their former estates; that they might frely exercise their Romish Religion without molestation; that no Garrison Souldiers, Shiriffe, or other Officer should interdeale within the iurisdiction of his Earledome; that the company of fifty horsemen with the Queenes pay might be restored to him, in the same State as formerly hee had lead them; that the spoilers of his Country and people might be punished, and that Sir Henry Bagnall should pay him a thousand pound promised in Dowry with his sister, whom Tir-Oen had married, and who was now deceased. Others likewise laid out their greeuances conceiued; such were O-Donell, Brian Mac-Hugh-Oge, Mac Mahun, and Euer Mac-Conley, who receiued most reasonable answeres to all their demands.

Sir Henry Wallop. Sir Rob. Gardiner.

(295) But vnto them the Commissioners likewise proposed certain Articles: as, That they should forthwith lay downe their Armes, disperse their Forces, acknowledge submissiuely their disloialties, admit the Queenes officers in their Gouernments, reedifie the Forts thy had defaced, suffer the Garrisons to liue without disturbance, make restitutions of spoiles taken, confesse vpon their oath how farre they had dealt with forraine Princes, and finally to renounce all forraine aide. But these propositions not pleasing the palate of those Rebels, they departed with a resolution to maintaine their owne demands. Which mooued Norris the Generall aided with the Lord Deputy to march with his Army vnto Armagh; whose approch (euer dreadfull to his enemies) when Tir-Oen heard of, in great perplexity hee forsooke the Fort of Black-Water, set on fire the villages about, and plucked downe the Towne of Dunganon, with part of his owne house, bewayling his estate to be past recouery; and was so much deiected in minde, as he sought nothing else but where to hide his rebellious head.

Propositions made to the Rebels.

Preparations against Tyr-oen.

(296) The Country now wasted, and no victuals to bee had, Norris set a Garrison in the Church of Armagh, strengthned Monahan, and proclaimed Tir-Oen Traitor in his owne territories. Which done, hee stayed in Vlster without any great deeds of martiall importance, onely Tir-Oen to gaine time presented vnto him a fained submission, signed with his owne hand, cast himselfe downe (a rare and vncouth ceremony) at the Queenes pictures feet, vngirt his sword, and craued pardon vpon his knees: and yet in the meane time dealt he for aides out of Spaine, and so far preuailed, as that Messengers were sent from King Philip with capitulations that the King of Spaine at a time prefixed should send them a competent Army to ioine with the Irish, that all conditions of peace with the English should be reiected, and that the Rebels should be furnished with munition from Spaine.

(297) Hereupon (though there was a cessation from Armes) he fell to harry and wast the Country, to burne villages, to driue away booties, and hauing done what hee could or would, as it were pricked in conscience, hee once againe put on the vizard of simulation, and sued for pardon and peace: which the better to effect, he sent the letters of king Philips promises vnto the L. Deputy, with the causes of his owne discontents, which moued him to doe what he did. And surely such was his dexteritie, or his Destiny, or the English no lesse dangerous, then frequent security, negligence and confidence, or the sparing of money by the grand disbursers, or the inbred lienty of the too-clement Queen, that his faire wordes were euer beleeued, and his foule offences pardoned: but whose fault soeuer, most of Connaught was now reuolted, all Vlster rebellious, onely seuen Castles kept for the Queene.

(298) In which desperate estate, Thomas Lord Burrough, a man full of courage, was sent Lord Deputy into Ireland; who no sooner arriued, but Norris either crossed by some higher-swaying Powers or by his fortune in these his proceedings (the seruices there being farre different from those his others, in other parts imployed) through griefe and discontent (the too vsuall guerdon of many a Noble Seruitor) as was thought, ended his life.

(299) The Lord Deputy no sooner had receiued the sword, and taken the charge of the kingdome of Ireland, but hee made forward to meete with the Rebels, holding it good policy to cut off delayes, which commonly increase the abilities of the enemy. Tir-Oen on the other side, as boldly made his resistance, and in a dangerous seruice encountered him at the Moiry, where the Lord Burrough by his valour made the way, and most valiantly wanne the Fort of Blackewater, (repayred and reenforced by the Rebels) the onely strength (besides Woods) that the Tir-Oen had. To rescue this Peece, immediately the enemy shewed himselfe: against whom Henry Earle of Kildare presently marching with a Coronet of Horse, and certaine voluntaries, (Gentlemen of the better sort) where he discomfited the enemy, though with losse of some men of note; as of Francis Vaughan, brother to the Lord Deputies wife, Robert Turner Sergeant Maior, and the two Fosterbrethren of the Earle Kildare, whose deaths hee so tooke, as within few dayes after, himselfe dyed for very griefe.

Blackwater again besieged.

(300) The Fort re-enforced with men and Munition, and the Lord Deputy vpon seruice in other parts; Tir-Oen now wauering betweene hope, feare, and shame, thought best to assay it by siege, as the place of greatest importance to further his designes: for that lost, hee saw his fortunes must downe, and thereupon with his strongest power, he beleaguered it. The Lord Deputy hearing thereof, prepared straightway to rescue the place, and marching with full pace and assurance of victory, whether through too forward a minde, distemperature of body, ayre, or of bogges, arrested hee was with sickneese, and violently cut off, by vntimely death, leauing to her Maiesty a misse in her Irish Estate, and a further security to the ranging Rebels.

The Lord Burrough dieth in Ireland.

(301) The

A.D. 1598.

The Earle of Ormond Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(301) The gouernment of Ireland was then committed to the Earle of Ormond vnder the Title of Lieutenant Generall of the Army, and vnto the Lord Chancellour Sir Robert Gardiner; vnto whom Tir-Oen (after his accuſtomed manner) in a long letter recapitulated his great grieuances, leauing not out the leaſt offence of the Souldiers, or actions of the Sheriffes; his breach of couenants with Sir John Norris hee coldly excuſeth, and laid his complaints againſt his enemies (the Engliſh) who had intercepted and ſuppreſſed his ſubmiſſion to the Queene, that they had raiſed intollerable impoſitions vpon the Nobles, and Commons; and that the reuenues of Ireland was ſhared among Counſellers, Lawyers, Souldiers, and Notaries: by which and other like ouertures, it was manifeſt that hee intended to extirpate the Engliſh quite out of Ireland.

(302) All this while his Siege lay before the Fort, of Blackewater; for the raiſing whereof, Sir Henry Bagnall (the bittereſt enemy that Tir oen euer had) with fourteene Enſignes of the choiſeſt troops were ſent, whom the Earle met neer vnto Armagh; and beeing egged on with a fretfull deſire of reuenge, bent all his force againſt the Marſhall, where beganne a bloudy conflict, and was continued with the death of that worthy Souldier (fighting amongſt the thickeſt) whereby Tir-Oen obtained not onely a ioyous triumph ouer his priuat enemy, but withall went away with a glorious victory ouer the Engliſh, who neuer ſince they firſt ſet footing in Ireland receiued ſo great an ouerthrow: for therein thirteene valiant Captaines loſt their liues, fifteene hundred common Souldiers were rowted and put to ſhamefull flight, diſparkled and cut in peeces. Vpon this diſaſter the Garriſon Souldiers (hauing with loyall hearts and weapons in hand, vnto extreame famine and exceeding diſtreſſe, held out to the laſt) laſtly ſurrendred the Peece of Blackwater vnto the Rebels; by which ouerthrow and ſurrender, the Iriſh became furniſhed with armour and munition to maintaine their warres, and Tir-oen renowned all the Realme ouer, as their only Horatius, and founder of their freedome.

The Engliſh foiled at Blackwater.

(303) Himſelfe ouer-ioyed with theſe gotten victories, ſwelled aboue meaſure with an haughty arrogancy, commanding all things as ſole Monarch of Ireland. Into Mounſter hee ſent Owny Mac-Rory-Og-O More with foure thouſand preying rogues, to forrage the Country, and the rabble that daily reſorted vnto them, burnt the houſes of the Engliſh, ranſacked their ſubſtance, and killed very many; Iames Fitz-Thomas one of the family of the Deſmonds they ſet vp as Earle of Deſmund, yet ſo, that hee ſhould hold as Tenant in Fee of the O-Neale, (the Earle of Tir-oen) and thus after a month, when they had kindled this fire and ſet Mounſter in a flame, they returned laded with rich booties and ſpoile. Tir-oen in the meane time had ſent his letters to King Philip of Spaine, wherein hee ſounded his victories with a full trumpet, aſſuring him that hee would heare of no peace with the Engliſh, were the conditions neuer ſo indifferent, and would for his part inuiolately keepe his promiſes with the Spaniſh King.

Robert Earle of Eſſex Lieutenant of Ireland.

(304) In this deſperate eſtate ſtood Ireland when Queene Elizabeth choſe Robert Earle of Eſſex, to bee Lord Lieutenant and Gouernor Generall thereof: a Peere in regard of his approued wiſdome, fortitude, and fidelity, thought fitteſt to repaire the detriments and loſſes therein ſuſtained, and in ſuch deere eſteeme with his ſoueraigne, and intire loue of the people, as the heauens ſeemed to haue framed him for the delight of man. In whom ſhined all ſparkles of true Nobility and Martiall honor, had not fortune marred all that the other graces had made. His commiſſion was large, and authority great, and led no leſſe then twenty thouſand compleat Souldiers, whereof ſixteen thouſand were foot, and the reſt horſe-men, ſo well furniſhed and prouided, as the like had neuer been ſeen before in Ireland.

(305) Thus honourably accompanied with the flower of Engliſh Gallants, and well-wiſhing acclamations of the people, with a ſtrange thunderclap in a cleere Sunne-ſhine day, hee ſet forward from London, and arriuing in Ireland, receiued the ſword; where (toward the end of March) falling in counſell touching his affaires, it was thought fitteſt by wiſe Statiſts, that Mounſter ſhould bee cleared of thoſe petty Rebels lying neerer, and of more validity then the remote Vlſter, of ſmall wealth and leſſe account. Whereupon contrary to his owne opinion formerly deliuered (whiles hee was in England) and his directions from her Maieſty in Ireland, hee made firſt into Mounſter, and became terrible vnto the Rebelles of thoſe parts, chaſing them before him into the woods, and ſo cleared that Prouince, with more expence of time, and loſſe of men, then was heere well liked by the State.

The Earle of Eſſex enters Mounſter.

(306) Hence hee made into Leinſter, againſt the O-Conors and O-Moiles, who had gathered head and taken Armes againſt their obedience; whom in light skirmiſhes he fortunately vanquiſhed; whence he ſent Sir Conyers Clifford Gouernour of Conaught one way towards Bellike, whilſt hee himſelfe tooke another way, ſo to diſtract the force of Tir-Oen. Sir Conyers with a power of fifteene hundred ſtrong marched ouer the Mountaines of Curlew, where O-Roirke and his Rebels ſuddenly aſſailed them, being out-wearied with trauell, and their powder neere ſpent; in which conflict, amongſt many other ſlaine, Sir Conyers Clifford himſelfe, as alſo Sir Alexander Rateliffe, ſealed the teſtimony of their valours with the loſſe of their liues.

Sir Conyers Clifford incountered with, and ſlaine.

(307) The Lord Geuerall hearing of this ouerthrow, made towards Vlſter, and came into the frontiers as farre as Louth, where Tir-Oen, on the other ſide of the Riuer, from the Hilles made his Bruado: But falling into his wonted vaine of diſſimulation, deſired a parley with the Lord Lieutenant, which hee altogether reiecting, anſwered, that if the Earle would conferre with him, hee ſhould find him the next morning in the head of his troops: on which day, when after a light skirmiſh, a horſeman of Tir-Ones troopes, with a loud voyce cried, that the Earle was not willing to fight, but to parley vpon peace with the Lord Generall; it was againe denied him. But the next day, as the Lord Lieutenant was in his March forward, one Hagan ſent from Tir-Oen, met him, and declared that the Earle moſt humbly deſired to haue the Queenes mercy and peace; and withall beſought, that his Lordſhip would be pleaſed to afford him audience, which if hee would grant, then would hee with all reuerence attend him at the Foord of the Riuer not farre from Louth.

He enters Vlſter.

Septem. 13.

Tir-oen ſueth for Parley, but is reiected.

(308) To this laſtly the Lord Lieutenant aſſented; and ſent to diſcouer the place, and beſtowing a troope of horſe vpon the next Hill, came downe alone vnto the Riuer; Tir-Oen attending on the other ſide, no ſooner ſaw his approach, but forthwith rode his horſe into the Riuer vp to the ſaddle, and with all ſemblances of a dutifull reſpect, moſt reuerently ſaluted his Lordſhippe: where, hauing had conference the ſpace of an houre, they both returned vnto their companies. There followed the Earle of Eſſex, Con, a baſe ſonne of Tir-Oen, inſtantly intreating in his fathers name, that certaine principall men might be admitted to a conference, whereunto his honour condiſcended.

Eſſex and Tir-oen meet in Parley.

A further conference.

(309) And taking with him the Earle of Southampton, Sir George Bourchier, Sir Warham St. Leger, Sir Henry Danuers, Sir Edward Wingfield; and Sir William Conſtable, went to the Foord, where Tir-oen, with his brother Cormoc, Mac Gennys, Mac Guir, Euer mac Cowley, Henry Ouington, and O-Quin, attended their comming. And falling in conference, i.

it was concluded that certaine Commissioners should the next day meete for a treaty of peace, and in the meane time there should bee a cessation of warres, from sixe weekes to sixe weekes, vntill the first of May: yet so, as it might be free on both sides, after foureteene dayes warning giuen, to resume hostility a fresh. And if any of Tir-Oens confederates would not thereto consent, to be prosecuted at the Lord Lieutenants pleasure.

Exceptions against Essex his seruices.

(310) But howsoeuer these his proceedings pleased the Marshalists, yet was her Maiesty highly incensed, that such expeditions had beene made without her directions, being informed that the Spring, Summer, and Autum, were spent without seruice vpon the Arch-Rebell, that her men were diminished, and large summes of money consumed, without doing that for which he was sent; that by this meanes the Rebels were encouraged, and the Kingdome of Ireland laid at hazard to bee lost: Which his defaults (for so they were apprehended) were (as hee conceiued) much aggrauated, by some that were hard against him, in her attentiue eare; vpon which surmize Her Maiesties sharpe Letters receiued (though hee had excused his seruice by others, whom himselfe sent at the same season) so ouer-pressed his troubled thoughts, as leauing his charge to be managed by others, hee made into England, well hoping to pacifie his Soueraignes displeasure with satisfaction from his owne mouth, and at Nonesuch had accesse to her presence, where after a short welcome, hee was commanded to his Chamber; and soone after was committed to the custody of the Lord Keeper.

Octob. 2.

(311) No sooner almost was the Lord Generall departed Ireland, but that Tir-Oen (notwithstanding the cessation from warre) drawing his Forces together, addressed himselfe for the Field, vnto whom Sir William Warren was sent, to charge him with breach of promise; but hee swelling in pride, peremptorily answered, that his doings were according to couenants, hauing giuen warning before, and his cause iust, for that the Lord Lieutenant was committed in England, vpon whose honour hee reposed his whole Estate; neither would hee haue any thing to doe with the Counsellors of Ireland, in whom (as hee said) hee neuer found either safety or truth. And thereupon presuming vpon Spaine, and giuing it forth that there would bee shortly an alteration in England; hee sends O Donell into Conaught, receiueth tumultuous persons, strengtheneth the weake, and comforteth the distrustfull, glorying euery where that hee would restore againe the ancient Religion, and liberty of Ireland, and expell the English from thence; to which end, some Money and Munition were sent him from Spaine, with Indulgences from Rome; and (for an especiall fauour) the Pope sent him a Plume of Phœnix Feathers, for a trophey of his victories, as Vrban long before him sent a Coronet of Peacocks Tayles vnto King John, when hee was first inuested Lord of Ireland.

Tir-Oen againe fals off.

The Popes Present bestowed on Tir-Oen.

(312) Tir-Oen thus feathered for a higher flight, Peacocke-like to shew his owne pride and greatnesse by his personall presence, vnder a religious pretext to worship a peece of the wooden Crosse of Christ, reputed to bee kept in the Monastery of the Holy Crosse in Tipperary, in the mid-winter would thither on Pilgrimage; whence he sent out Mac-Guir with a number of rifeling Robbers, to despoyle and prey on the peaceable Subiects; with whom Sir Warham Saint Leger met, and at the first Race with his Lance ranne Mac-Guir through the body, and was by him runne through himselfe. Whereupon Tir-Oen fearing more blowes, made ready to returne from Mounster sooner then was expected, or himselfe meant.

The Lord Mountioy Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(313) At this time Charles Blunt, Lord Mountioy (afterwards created Earle of Deuon-shire) was sent Lord Lieutenant Generall into Ireland, who with small port and little solemnity, entred vpon the Gouernment, the state of that Country lying desperately diseased, and almost past recouery. At his first comming, hearing that Tir-Oen was to depart Mounster, he hastned to stop his passage in Fereal, and there to giue him Battell, which the Earle preuented by taking another way, hauing intelligence of the Lord Generals designes; but the Spring drawing on, the Deputy put himselfe on his March towards Vlster, with purpose to driue the Earle to a stand, whiles Sir Henry Docwra at Lough-foile, and Sir Mathew Morgan at Baloshanon planted the Garrisons, which they with small adoe effected, and suppressed the Rebels in diuers ouerthrowes.

A.D. 1600 In Febru.

In May.

(314) The Lord Generall likewise held Tir-Oen very hard, and with light skirmishes euer put him to the worse, so that he now perceiuing his fortune to goe backe, with-drew himselfe backe into his old corners. The Lord Lieutenant then entred into Lease, the place of refuge and receit of all the Rebels in Leinster, where hee slew Ony-Mac Rory-Og, chiefe of the Family of the O-Mores, a bloudy, bold, and desperate young man: and so chased out the rest of those his Rake-hels, as that neuer since they were seene in those parts. And although in the commensing of these affaires, the Equinox was past, and the Winter weather begun in that Climate, yet marched he forward to the entrance of the Moyery three miles beyond Dundalke.

(315) The passage into Vlster is euery where naturally cumbersome, and this way made more by the Rebels, who had fortified and blocked vp the entrance with fences of stakes stucke in the ground, with hurdles ioyned together, and stones in the midst, with turfes of earth laid betwixt hils, woods, and bogges, and manned the place with a number of Souldiers: notwithstanding, the English brake through those Pallisadoes, and beating the enemies backe, the Lord Deputy placed a Garrison eight miles from Armagh, where in memory of Sir Iohn Norris, hee named the Fort Mount-Norris: but to omit many other skirmishes in his returne, that at Carlingford was most famous, where the enemies assembled to stop his way, were all of them discomfited, and put to fearefull flight.

The Glinnes cleered of Rebels.

(316) In the midst of Winter hee entred the glinnes, that is, the Vallies of Leinster, a secure receptacle of the Rebels, where he brought into subiection Donel Spanioh, Phelim Mac-Feogh, and the O-Tooles, of whom he tooke hostages. Then went hee to Fereall, and draue Tirell, the most approued warrier of all the Rebels, from his fastnesse, (that is, his bogges and bushes) into Vlster; the Territory of Fernes he laid waste, spoyled Fues, and in Breany placed a Garrison, receiuing such into mercy as deliuered vp hostages. Which done, and the Spring approaching, he marched to Vlster, fortified Armagh, and went so farre forward, that he remoued Tir-Oen from the Fort of Blacke-water, who had very artificially encamped himselfe there.

The Pope and Spaine busied to hold vp Tir-Oen.

(317) As the Lord Generall was thus busied to reduce Ireland to obedience, so the Pope and Spaine studied to hold vp Tir-Oen, and to maintaine the Rebellions; their Agents were a Spaniard, elected by the Pope Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Clowfort, the Bishop of Killaloe, and Archer a Iesuite. These by Prayer, and promises of heauenly rewards, wonne Philip to send succours into Ireland, which forthwith he did, vnder his Generall Don Iohn D'Aquila, a man of a conceited hope that all would be his, as confident of much aid from the titular Earle Desmond, and from Florence Mac-Carty, a Rebell of great might; wherein hee was deceiued: for Sir George Carew, Lord President of Mounster, had preuented that designe, and sent them prisoners into England, where they were kept sure.

Don John De Aquila sent into Ireland.

(318) Don D'Aquila with two thousand Spaniards, all of them olde trayned Souldiers, with certaine Irish Fugitiues, landed at Kinsale in Mounster, the last of October, and straightwayes publiſhed a writing, wherein he glorioufly ſtiled himſelfe with this Title, Maſter Generall, and Captaine of the Catholike King in the Warres of GOD, for holding and keeping the Faith in Ireland; indeauouring to make the World beleeue, that Queene Elizabeth, by the definitiue ſentences of the Popes, was depriued of her Kingdomes, and her Subiects abſolued and freed from their Oath of Allegiance, and that he was come to deliuer them out of the Diuels iawes, and the Engliſh tyranny; vpon which ſuggeſtions, many diſtempered and wicked perſons began to bandy on his ſide.

(319) The Lord Deputy gathering his Companies, haſted to Kinſale, and encamped neere vnto the Towne on the Land ſide, whiles Sir Richard Leuiſon with two of the Queenes Shippes incloſed the Hauen, to forbid all acceſſe to the Spaniard; when from both ſides, the thundering Canon played vpon the Towne: but newes being brought that two thouſand Spaniards more were arriued at Bere-hauen, Baltimore, and Caſtle-Hauen, Sir Richard was imployed vpon them, in which ſeruice hee ſunke fiue of their Shippes.

A new ſupply of Spaniards vnder Alphonſo O-Campo

(320) Vnto theſe new landed Spaniards, whoſe Leader was Alphonſo-O-Campo, O-Donel ouer the ice, by ſpeedy iournies and vnknowen by-wayes repaired, vnſeene of the Engliſh; and a few dayes after Tir-Oen himſelfe, with O-Roicke, Raimund Burke, Mac-Mahun, Randall Mac Surley, Tirrell the Baron of Lixnaw, and the moſt ſelected choyce of all the Rebels came vnto them, who muſtered together, made ſixe thouſand Foot, and fiue hundred Horſe; all confident of victory, as being freſh, ſtrong, and exceeding in number, where, the Engliſh were outwearied through Winter ſiege, with ſcarſity of victuall, and their Horſe weake with ſore trauell.

Tir-Oens braues does.

(321) In this hope, Tir Oen, vpon an Hill not a mile from the Engliſh Campe, made a Brauado two dayes together, intending to haue put theſe new ſupplyes of Spaniards, with eight hundred Iriſh, by night into Kinſale, as by Letters intercepted from Don D'Aquila did appeare. Which to preuent, the Lord Deputy appointed eight Enſignes to keepe watch, and himſelfe with the Preſident of Mounſter, and the Marſhall, at the foot of the Hill, choſe out a conuenient plot to giue the Earle battell, who the next morning ſeeing the Engliſh ſo forward, by his Bag-pypers ſounded the retreat, whom the Lord Generall followed, and forced them to ſtand in the brinke of a bogge, where their Horſemen were diſordered, and rowted by the Earle of Clan-Ricard.

The Rebels rowted.

(322) The maine battell then wauering in feare, was violently charged by the Lord Deputy himſelfe, who in his directions diſcharged the part of a worthy Commander, and in fighting, the Office of a valiant Souldier; for the Rebels not able to withſtand his fury, brake their arrayes, and in diſorder confuſedly fled; in whoſe purſuit many of them felt the reuenging edge of the Engliſh Sword. Tir-Oen, O-Donel, and the reſt flung away their weapons, and ſaued their liues by flight; but Alphonſo O-Campo, with three other Spaniſh Captaines, and ſixe Enſigne Bearers, were taken priſoners, nine of their Enſignes borne away by the Engliſh, and twelue hundred of his Spaniards ſlaine, ſuch welcome found theſe new gueſts in Ireland. This victory obtained, both quelled the pride of the intruding Spaniards, and exceedingly daunted the hearts of the diſloyall Iriſh; ſo that Tir-oen was forced into his ſtarting holes in Vlſter, O-Donell driuen into Spaine, and the reſt of that rebellious rabble ſcattered into obſcure places, where their beſt ſuccour was to play leaſt in ſight.

Don Alphonſo taken Priſoner.

The Rebels diſparkled.

(323) The Lord Generall returning to the ſiege of Kinſale, began to raiſe rampires, and to mount his Canons neerer the Towne, wherein ſixe dayes were ſpent without any impeach from the Spaniard, whoſe courage being cut by the loſſe of their fellowes, ſought rather how to get cleare and be gone, then to aduenture reſiſtance againſt ſuch a warlike oppoſer. D'Aquila hereupon ſent his Letters by his Drumme Maior to the Lord Deputy, wherein hee craued, that ſome Gentleman of credit might be ſent into the Towne, with whom hee might Parley for a Peace. Whereunto his Lordſhip inclined, and to that end ſent thither Sir William Godolphin.

The Spaniards ſue for Peace.

(324) Vnto whom D'Aquila ſignified, that hee had found the Lord Deputy, though his eager enemy, yet an honourable perſon; the Iriſh of no valor, rude and vnskill, yea, and (that which hee ſore feared) perfidious and falſe: That hee was ſent from the King of Spaine his Maſter to aid two Earles, and now hee much doubted whether there were any ſuch in Rerum natura, conſidering that one tempeſtuous puffe of warre had blowen the one of them into Spaine, and the other into the North, ſo as they were no more to be ſeene: willing therefore hee was to treat about a Peace, that might be good for the Engliſh, and not hurtfull to the Spaniards; albeit he wanted nothing requiſite to the holding out of the Siege, and expected euery day out of Spaine freſh ſupplies to finde the Engliſh worke and trouble enough.

(325) The matter thus propoſed, and the Engliſh weake and weary through a long Winters ſiege, the Lord Deputy conſented to an agreement, the Articles whereof were theſe.

January 2.

1 That Iohn D'Aquila ſhould quit the places which he held in the Kingdome of Ireland, aſwell in the Towne of Kinſale, as the Forts and Caſtle of Baltimore, Berehauen, and Caſtle-hauen; and ſhould deliuer them vnto the Lord Deputy, or to whom hee ſhould appoint.

Iohn Stow.

Concluſions of Peace.

2 That Don D'Aquila and his Spaniards ſhould depart with Armes, Money, Munition, and Banners diſplayed; the Souldiers notwithſtanding to beare no Armes againſt the Queene of England, till ſuch time as they were vnſhipped in ſome part of Spaine.

3 That Shippes and Victuals ſhould bee granted vnto them in their departure, for their Money, and at ſuch reaſonable prizes as the Countrey could affoord.

4 That if contrary winds inforced them into any other Port of Ireland, or elſe into England, they might be intreated as friends, with ſafety of harbor, and prouiſions neceſſary for their money to further their departure.

5 That a ceſſation ſhould be from warre, a ſecurity from iniuries, and victuall granted at reaſonable rates, whiles they remained in preparing for Spaine.

6 That the Ships in which they ſhould bee imbarked, might freely paſſe by other Engliſh Shippes without moleſtation; and the Shippes arriued in Spaine, might ſafely returne backe without any impeachment of the Spaniards: for ſecurity whereof, the ſaid D'Aquila ſhould deliuer for hoſtages ſuch three of their Captaines as the Lord Deputy would chuſe. Vnto theſe Articles Don Iohn ſolemnely ſwore, on the behalfe of the Catholike King his Maſter, and with his hand ſubſcribed his name, Don Iohn D'Aquila.

(326) The troubleſome cloude of moſt likely dangers, thus diſſolued in Mounſters faire Ayre, the Coaſts of Ireland were ſhortly cleared of thoſe forraine intruders, who notwithſtanding their former great bragges, with ſhame and diſhonour embarked themſelues for home, their Companies being much empayred, and proud ſpirits brought downe. And now the Ben-hadad Tir-Oen, who had boaſted all Ireland was his, with fearefull flights and by-wayes recouered his lurking holes in Vlſter; after hee had loſt moſt of his men, whom the ſwelling and violently-running Riuers, by reaſon of Winter flouds, had ſwallowed vp: where his Traytors head, burdened with the dreads of his owne deſerts, could take no reſt, no not ſo much as to breathe without feare, diſtruſting euery ſhadow that he ſaw, and ſhifting out of one by-corner, before hee well knew where to find another.

(327) Meane

(327) Meane whiles, the Lord Deputy refreſhed his weary and winter beaten Souldiers, repayred the decayes, and renewed the Garriſons in Mounſter; which done, hee departed for Dublin, where wearing out the winter ſtormes, towards the Spring, by a gentle and eaſie march, well appointed, he returned into Vlſter, meaning to belay the Rebell on euery ſide, by planting his Forts, ſo to take him in his toyle. Thus being approached vnto Blacke water, hee tranſported his Army ouer the Foord vpon floates, vpon whoſe banke, beneath the old Fort, he erected a * new, to ſuch terror of the Arch-Rebell, as hee ſet on fire his owne Houſe at Dungannon, and got himſelfe further from danger; whether the Lord Deputy immediately marched, and made ſpoyle without any ſpare; the Corne fields were deſtroyed, the Villages fired, and booties brought in on euery ſide. The Forts in Logh, Crew, Lough-Reogh, and Mogher Lecowd, were yeelded vp, and Garriſons placed in Lough Eaugh, or Sydney, and in Monaghan, whence with their continuall ſallies, they ſo croſſed the enemies, that ſeeing themſelues inuironed about, and no way open for eſcape, like wilde Beaſts they hid their heads in the thickets, Forreſts, and Woods, muttering complaints againſt their late magnified Tir-Oen; exclaiming he had engaged the ruine of the whole Nation, for his owne priuate diſcontents, and that theſe warres, howſoeuer beneficiall to him, yet were they moſt pernicious vnto them; whereupon changing their mindes with their fortunes, began a vie, who ſhould be firſt in ſhewing their alteration, by comming in to the Deputy.

Great ſpoyles made in Vlſter.

The Rebels exclaime againſt the Arch-Rebell.

(328) The Earle not ignorant how their affections declined, his owne forces ſhaken, and the fidelity of his followers more and more ſuſpected, hee once more determined to preuent the worſt, by his ſubmiſſion, which in humble Letters hee ſent to the Queene, wherein with prayers and teares he craued pardon of his faults: to ſuch an ebbe was the ſwelling tides of his rebellious heart brought. Her Maieſty (whoſe Nature was Mercy) euer diſtaſtiue of bloud, gaue the Lord Deputy authority to pardon his life, though hardly drawne to remit his offences, they being ſo many and great: His friends that affected him, and Mac Baron his Brother, daily ſolicited the Deputy for his peace, which laſtly, vpon an abſolute promiſe, to put his life and reuenewes, without any condition, to the will of the Queene, was granted; and at Mellifont, accompanied with two perſons and no more, had acceſſe into the Chamber of Preſence, where the Lord Deputy ſate in a Chayre of Eſtate, moſt of his Marſhaliſts ſtanding about him.

(329) Tir-Oen in baſe and poore array, with a deiected countenance, at the very entrance fell downe vpon his knees, and ſo reſted till he was commanded to ariſe, and come neerer; when ſtepping forward a few paces, he fell againe proſtrate, and like a moſt humble Supplicant, in words well couched (as cunning he was both in ſpeech and action) acknowledged his ſinnes againſt GOD, and fault vnto her Maieſty; and thus began his ſubmiſſion to the Lord Generall.

In the royall clemency of my dread Soueraigne and moſt gracious Queene, I doe onely lay the hope and reſt of my now remaining eſtate; vnto whoſe pleaſure I abſolutely remit my life, and whole reuenewes; and doe moſt ſubmiſſiuely deplore mine owne miſery, beſeeching againe her mercy, whoſe bountifull fauours I haue heretofore, and mighty powers now of late both felt and found; and well hope, that the fountaine of her euer-flowing graces are not drawen drie. Let mee (I pray) bee the ſubiect, whereon her mercy may worke, and an example for euer of her mild clemency, both to diuulge her Princely lenity, and to redeeme in ſome part the honour I haue loſt. For age I am not ſo vnſeruiceable, nor of body ſo vnable, neither in courage ſo deiected, but that my faithfull ſeruice in her behalfe, may expiate and make ſome meaſure of ſatisfaction, for theſe my many and moſt diſloyall Rebellions. And yet I may iuſtly complaine, that through the malitious enuie of ſome, I haue beene hardly and vnfriendly dealt with, which may ſomewhat extenuate my crime and offence; for —— But as hee was enforcing this point further, the Lord Deputy interrupted his ſpeech, and with a few words deliuered with great authority, (which in a Marſhalliſt ſtands in ſtead of Eloquence) told him, that there was no excuſe to bee heard, his crimes were too great; and thereupon commanded him to depart the Preſence: which hee did with a countenance ſeeming very heauy and ſad. The next day departing for Dublin, he tooke Tir-Oen thither, meaning to tranſport him for England, had not the death of the Queene hindered his deſigne. Theſe things premiſed, and Ireland thus recouered that was in hazard to bee loſt, let vs returne to our Engliſh affaires, from whence theſe Iriſh bogges haue detayned vs too long.

(330) On what tearmes the Earle of Eſſex left Ireland, we haue already heard, and to what lamentable ſucceſſe the height of his riſe brought him, is now to be related; wherein he may be the example of Fortunes daliance, and of the vnſtayed felicity had in this life: a man indeed filled with the affection of his Prince and the People, and fraught with honourable abilities to purchaſe both, vntill by his owne vnaduiſedneſſe (for ſo it muſt needs be cenſured) he clouded his honour, wiſdome, and loyalty, with the ſhadowes of his owne diſcontents. Whether his Soueraignes fauours were the wings of his ambitions, or the dependancies of men of Warre, the pillars of his high hopes, I doe not cenſure; but that ſome ſecret vnder-workings gaue fire to his paſſionate diſcontents, I doubt not, hauing ſeene his owne Letters penned in that behalfe. Howſoeuer, ſure it is, the Eye of Ielouſie ſtill attended him, and his doings now laſtly were more noted, then was made ſhew of: for being yet in Ireland with an eminent authority, followed with the flower and chiefeſt men of Warre, and ſuſpected to be too well reſpected by the Arch-Rebell Tir-Oen, it was held good policy (vpon another pretended occaſion) to muſter Forces, and to make a Lord Lieutenant Generall of all England, which was, the Right Honourable Charles Howard, Earle of Nottingham, Lord high Admirall.

(331) The ſhew of this preparation was a preuenting prouidence (as was pretended) againſt a Spaniſh Nauy in new rigging for the Seas; and indeed ſuch preparation in that Summer was made, as the like had not beene in England ſince Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne. For London was allotted to furniſh ſixteene Shippes to the Seas, and ſixe thouſand Souldiers for the Land ſeruice, whereof three thouſand were to reſt euer in a readineſſe, and the other three thouſand (all of them Houſholders) to attend and guard her Maieſties royall Perſon. And out of many Countries adioyning, ſuch numbers of braue Horſe and Horſemen were gathered, as neuer till then had beene ſeene; the fame whereof was ſo farre ſpread, as neither Spaine, nor any other, could haue any heart to make attempt this way.

(332) But the Earle of Eſſex arriuing in England, not onely peaceably, but alſo very priuately and vnaccompanyed (as hath beene ſaide) and now remaining in the Lord Keepers cuſtody, was often and ſeriouſly dealt with, by that truly Honourable and prouident Statiſt (of whom he was intirely affected) ſomewhat to decline his lofty ſoaring, leſt in mounting too high, hee ſhould melt his waxen wings againſt the hot Sunne, and not to ſuffer the ſore to feſter till it were paſt cure; to which purpoſe alſo he afterward wrote him a letter of pithy and ſapient perſwaſions, out of the abundance of his well-wiſhing heart; the coppy whereof wee held worthy to be heere preſented.

The Lord Keeper to the Earle of Essex Iuly 18. An. 1598.

(333) My very good Lord: It is often seene, that a stander by seeth more then hee that playeth the game; and for the most part euery man in his owne cause, standeth in his owne light, and seeth not so cleerely as hee should. Your Lordshippe hath dealt in other mens causes, and in great and weighty affaires with great wisdome and iudgement; now your owne is in hand, you are not to contemne or refuse the aduice of any that loueth you, how simple soeuer. In this order I range my selfe; of those that loue you none more simple, and none that loueth you with more true and honest affection: which shall pleade mine excuse, if you shall either mistake, or misconster, my words or meaning; but in your Lordships honorable wisdome I neither doubt nor suspect the one or other. I will not presume to aduise you, but I will shoot my bolt, and tell you what I thinke. The beginning and too-long continuing of this vnseasonable discontent you haue seene and prooued, by which you may aime at the end. If you hold still this course (which hitherto you finde to be worse and worse, and the longer you goe, the farther out of the way) there is little hope or likelyhood that the end will bee better. You are not yet so farre gone, but you may well returne; the returne is safe, the progresse dangerous and desperate.

In this course you hold, if you haue any enemies, you doe that for them which they could neuer doe for themselues. Your friends you leaue open to scorne and contempt; you forsake your selfe, and ouerthrow your fortunes, and ruinate your honour and reputation. You giue that courage and comfort to the forreine enemies, as greater they cannot haue. For what can bee more welcome, or more pleasing newes vnto them, then to heare that her Maiesty and the Realme are maymed of so worthy a member, who hath so often and so valiantly quailed and danted them. You forsake your Country, when it hath most neede of your counsell or helpe. And lastly you faile in that indissoluble dutie which you owe to your most gracious Soueraigne. A duty imposed vpon you, not by nature or policy onely, but by that religious and sacred band, wherein the diuine Maiesty of Almighty God hath by the rule of Christianitie obliged you.

For the foure first, your constant resolution may perhaps moone you to esteeme them as light: but beeing well weighed they are not light, nor lightly to bee regarded. And for the two last, it may bee that the cleerenesse of your inward conscience, may seeme to content your selfe. But that is not enough; these duties stand not onely in contemplation, or in inward meditation: their effects bee externall action, and when that faileth, the substance faileth.

This beeing your present state and condition, what is to be done? what is the remedy? My good Lord I lacke wisdome and iudgement to aduise you; but I will neuer lacke an honest true heart to wish well, nor (being warranted by a good conscience) will feare to speake what I thinke.

I haue begunne plainely, bee not offended if I proceede so. Bene cedit, qui cedit tempori. Seneca saith well, Lex si nocentem punit, cedendum est iustitiæ; si innocentem, cedendum est fortunæ. The medicine and remedy is, not to contend and striue, but humbly to yeelde and submit. Haue you giuen a cause, and yet take a scandall vnto you? then all you can doe, is too little to make satisfaction. Is cause of scandall giuen vnto you? yet policy, duty, and religion, enforce you to sue, yeeld, and submit, to your Soueraigne, betweene whom and you there can bee no proportion of duty. When God requires it as a principall duty and seruice to himselfe; and when it is euident, that great good may ensue of it to your friends, your selfe, your Countrie, and your Soueraigne, and extreame harme by the contrary: there can be no dishonour or hurt to yeeld, but in not doing of it, is dishonor and impiety.

The difficulty (my good Lord) is to conquer your selfe, which is the height of true valour and fortitude; whereunto all your honorable actions haue intended. Doe it in this, and God will bee pleased, her Maiestie (I doubt not) well satisfied: your Country will take good, and your friends take comfort by it; and your selfe (I mention you last, for I know that of all these, you esteeme your selfe least) shall receiue honour, and your enemies (if you haue any) shall bee disappointed, of their bitter-sweete hopes.

I haue deliuered what I thinke, simply and truly; and leaue you to determine according to your wisdome. If I haue erred, it is Error amoris, not, Amor Erroris. Construe and accept it (I beseech you) as I meane it; not as an aduise, but as an opinion, to bee allowed or cancelled at your pleasure. If I might conueniently haue conferred with your selfe in person, I would not haue troubled you with so many idle blots. Whatsoeuer you iudge of this mine opinion, yet be assured my desire it to further all good meanes that may tend to your good, and so wishing you all honourable happinesse, I rest your Lordshippes most ready and faithfull, though vnable, poore friend.

The Earles Answere.

(334) My very good Lord. Though there is not the man this day liuing, whom I would sooner make a Iudge of any question that did concerne mee, then your selfe: yet you must giue me leaue to tell you, that in some cases I must appeale from all earthlie Iudges; and if in any, then surelie in this, when the highest Iudge on earth hath imposed vpon mee the heauiest punishment, without triall or hearing. Since then I must either answere your Lordships arguments, or forsake mine owne iust defence, I will force mine aking head to doe me seruice for an houre.

I must first deny my discouragement, which was forced to bee an humorous discontentment, and in that it was vnseasonable, and is too long continuing, your Lordshippe should rather condole with me, then expostulate. Naturall seasons are expected here below, but violent and vnseasonable stormes come from aboue: there is no tempest to the passionate indignation of a Prince, nor that at any time so vnseasonable, as when it lighteth on those that might exspect an haruest of their painefull and carefull labours. Hee that is once wounded must feele smart till his hurt is cured, or the part senseless; but cure I expect none, her Maiesties heart being obdurate; and be without sense I cannot. But then (you say) I may aime at end. I doe more then aime, for I see an end of all my fortunes, and haue set an end to all my desires. In this course doe I any thing for mine enemies? when I was present, I found them absolute, and therfore I had rather they should triumph alone, then haue mee attendant vpon their Chariot. Or doe I leaue my friends? when I was a Courtier, I could yeeld them no fruit of my loue to them; now I am an Heremite, they shall beare no enuy for their loue to me. Or doe I forsake my selfe; because I doe enioy my selfe? Or doe I ouerthrow my fortunes, because I build not a fortune of paper walles, which euery puffe of winde blowes downe? Or doe I ruin nat: mine honor because I leaue following the pursuit, or wearing the false marke of the shadow of honour? Doe I giue courage or comfort to the forraine enemies, because I reserue my selfe to encounter them, or because I keepe mine heart from baseneesse, though I cannot keepe my fortune from declining? No, no, I giue euery one of these considerations his due right, and the more I weigh them, the more I find my selfe iustified from offending in any of them. As for the two last obiections, that I forsake my Country when it hath most need of me, and faile in that indissoluble duty which I owe to my Soueraigne: I answere, that if my Country had at this time need of my publike seruice, her Maiesty that gouernes it would not haue driuen me to a priuate life.

I am tied to my Country by two bands; one publike, to discharge carefullie, faithfullie, and industriously, that trust that is committed vnto me; and the other priuate, to sacrifice for it my life and carkase which haue beene nourished in it. Of the first I am free, being dismissed or disabled by her Maiesty. Of the other, nothing can free mee

but death, and therefore no occasion of performance shall offer it selfe, but I will meete it halfe way. The indissoluble duety which I owe to her Maiesty, is the duetie of allegiance, which I will neuer, nor can faile in; the duty of attendance is no indissoluble duety. I owe her Maiesty seruice of an Earle, and of a Marshall of England. I haue beene contented to doe her the seruice of a Clerke, but can neuer serue her as a villaine, as a slaue. But yet (you say) I must giue way to time: so I doe, for now I see the storme come I haue put my selfe into the harbour. Seneca saith, we must giue way to fortune. I know that fortune is blind and strong; and therefore I goe as farre out of the way as I can. You say the remedy is not to striue, I neither striue nor seeke for remedy, but I must yeeld and submit, I can neuer yeeld my selfe to bee guilty, or this imposition lately laide vpon me, to be iust: I owe so much to the Author of truth, as I can neuer yeeld truth to be falshood, or falshood to be truth. Haue I giuen cause (you aske) and take a scandall? No, I gaue not cause to take vp so much as Fimbrius his complaint, for I did totum telum corpore accipere. I patiently beare all, and sensibly feele all that I then receiued. When this scandall was giuen mee, nay when the vilest of all indignities are done vnto me, doth Religion enforce me to serue? doth God require it? is it impiety not to doe it? why? cannot Princes erre? cannot subiects receiue wrong? is an earthly power or authority infinite? Pardon me, pardon mee my Lord, I can neuer subscribe to these principles: but Salomons foole laughes when he is stricken: Let these that mean to make their profite by Princes faults, shew to haue no feare of Princes iniuries. Let them acknowledge an infinite absolutenes in earth, that doe not beleeue in an absolute infinitenes in heauen. As for mee, I haue receiued wrong, I feele it, my cause is good I know it, and whatsoeuer come, all the powers on earth can neuer shew more strength and constancy in oppressing, then I can shew in suffering, whatsoeuer shall be imposed vpon me.

Your Lordship in the beginning of your letter made your selfe a looker on, and mee a player of mine owne game; so you may see more then I: but you must giue mee leaue to tell you in the end of mine, that since you but see and I suffer, I must of necessity feele more then you. I must craue your Lordships patience, to giue him that hath a crabbed fortune leaue to vse a crabbed stile. But whatsoeuer my stile is, there is no heart more humble, nor more affected toward your Lordship, then that of your Lordships poore friend.

R. ESSEX.

(335) The distempered humor discouering in selfe in this letter, argueth both the depth of his setled discontent; and the danger of giuing way to violent passions, which not onely depriue the wisest of the vse of their owne vnderstanding, but also blinde their eyes that they cannot see, nor apprehend the benefit of other mens faithfull counsels. Notwithstanding, it pleased her gracious Highnesse (whom he so censureth as wronging him, for lending a more attentiue eare to his enemies suggestions, then to his owne satisfactions) first, to remitte his durance to his owne house, and then loth to looke into his faults but with her Princely eye of fauor to proceed vnto some moderate censure of his actions, to the end he might see his owne errors, and shee so limit his power as her owne, might be secured.

Essex commanded to his owne house.

(336) To which end shee assigned certein of her Priuy Councell to conuent him concerning the breaking of his former instructions for the North-Irish prosecution, and the manner of his treating with Tir. Oen, his comming from Ireland, and leauing that Kingdome contrary to her Maiesties expresse commandement, signed vnder her Royall Hand and Signet. Whereunto his answere was, that the state of Warre held it a Maxime, to make good the Stand before the Remoue, and that it was one thing at Table to direct, but another thing in field to effect, especially in Ireland, whose war was with Boggs and Woods, aswell as with Men. And to the rest of the obiections hee answered with such obedient discretion, and loyall submission, as he well satisfied the Honourable Presence, onely a suspension from the exercise of some of his Offices was decreed, vntill her Maiesties pleasure should otherwise order it. Shortly after he was set at full liberty; the Queene sending him word, that shee well hoped his surest guard would now be his owne discretion.

Essex suspended from the exercise of his office.

(337) But seeing his wonted greatnesse restrained, though the scope of his liberty was thus farre enlarged, hee presently mounted higher with the wings of discontent: for depriued of Offices, neglected in Court, and all his forraine seruices powred into her Maiesties lap, was now (as he imagined) there wrapped vp, and laid in oblinion. Neither were these his grieuances lessened by his military followers, who daily watred these ill set plants with their exasperated complaints, till they were sprung to some height; and still to nourish their sap, many projects were cast, and conferences held how to lop off other branches, which as they feared would hinder their growth; till lastly, at Drury House they agreed on the manner (O had it withered before it had blowmed, or dyed in the graffing, before it tooke sappe) which was by violent hand to bring the Earle into her Maiesties presence, and to remoue from her such as they deemed his oposites.

The conference at Drury house.

(338) The frequent assembly vnto Essex house by Noblemen, Knights, Captaines, and others, was presently obserued by the Statists in Court, to stoppe the currant of which confluence before it grew to a floud, Secretary Herbert was sent from her Maiesty to require him to repayre before the Lords of her Councell, then assembled at Salisbury Court, which hee excusing with sicknesse, neglected to do, and the same night vpon some sinister reports set a double watch about him, ptetending some danger to bee meant to his person. For whose defence the next morning (being Sunday) many repaired vnto his house, among whom, as chiefe were the Earles of Rutland and Southampton, the Lord Sandes and Monteagle, accompanied with a Troupe of gallant Gentlemen their followers.

Febr. 8.

(339) Her Maiesty hearing of these disorderly proceedings, in her Princely wisedome thought to cast water vpon this begunne fire, before it brake forth into flame, and thereupon sent foure men of much honour vnto his place, to offer him iustice for any griefs, and to command the assembly to depart. The persons sent were the L. Keeper of the Great Seale the Earle of Worcester; Sir Francis Knowles his vncle, and the Lord Chiefe Iustice of England, all of them in high honour and fauour with the Earle himselfe.

The Queen sent foure of her Councell vnto the Earle of Essex.

(340) These comming to his house without Temple-Barre, were receiued in themselues, but scarse any of their seruants suffered to follow, excepting the Bearer of the Purse and Seale, where finding the Court full of those his followers, the Lord Keeper putting off his hatte, tolde them that they were sent by her Maiesty to vnderstand the cause of this their assembly, and to let them know, that if they had any particular cause of griefe against any person what soeuer, they should haue hearing and Iustice, The Earle of Essex answered, that his life was sought after, & that hee had beene perfidiously dealt withall. To which the Lord Chief Iustice replyed, that if any such matter was attempted, it was fitte for him to declare it, assuring him of a faithfull relation, and that her Maiesty would doe him Iustice. Which promises the Lord Keeper seconded, and desired the Earle to declare his griefes, if not openly, yet in priuate, and he doubted not but to procure him full satisfaction, and then turning towards the multitude, with a louder voice, said; I do command you all vpon your alleageance, to lay downe your Weapons, and depart. Whereupon the Earle himselfe went into his Booke-chamber, these foure Councellors following him in hope of priuate conference; but so farre off was he from hearing them further, or answering to their demands mands, that leauing them there vnder ſure cuſtody, he returned to his other attendants.

Eſſex entreth into London.

(341) With whom in tumultuous manner, hee made into London, his followers crying, that the Earle of Eſſex ſhould haue been murthered by Cobham, Cecill, and Rawley, all men amaſed what this did meane. Thus paſt he from Ludgate through Cheapeſide, into Fan-church ſtreet, where he entred the houſe of a ſuppoſed friend (then one of the Shiriffes) who ſeeing the multitude, auoided himſelfe out at a backe-dore, when preſently in diuers parts of the City Eſſex was proclaimed a Traitor, to the no leſſe griefe of the Citizens, then feares of his followers, and thence returning with a Halbert in his hand, and a table-napkin about his necke, came into Gracious ſtreet, where a while he made his ſtand, (the Lord Maior and others being aſſembled at the vpper end towards Leaden-Hall) no one Citizen or ſeruant ſhewing him any ſigne of aſſiſtance. The caſe ſo deſperate, one of the principall offenders contriued how by redeeming his fault, to ſaue his owne life; who haſtening into the Strand to Eſſex houſe, and comming to Sir John Danis, as being ſent from the Earle, gat releaſe of the foure Counſellors, vnder whoſe guard they had been hitherto kept.

Thom. Smith.

He returneth, & is forced from Ludgate.

(342) Eſſex now diſpairing of all ſuccours in London, ſaw it was booteleſſe there to make his abode, and therefore retired againe towards Pauls; meaning to paſſe Ludgate the way that hee came, but being reſiſted by a company of Pikemen, and other forces, made by that ſtout and noble Prelate, the then Lord Biſhoppe of London, hee was put backe, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſore hurt, and young Tracy ſlaine; beſides ſome others on the Queenes part, himſelfe narrowly eſcaping, being thruſt through the hatte with a pyke. So hence againe returning, at Queene Hiue hee tooke boate, bidding the City and his fortunes adue.

Taketh boate & fortifieth his houſe in Strand.

(343) His enterpriſe thus fruſtrate, with a mind diſtracted hee rowed vp the riuer, and landed at the Water-gate of his owne houſe, which hee preſently fortified; and the Lord Admirall aſſaulted, ſuffering notwithſtanding the Counteſſe of Eſſex, the Lady Rich, and their Gentlewomen to depart, which done, hee forced the Garden euen to the walles of the houſe. Some reſiſtance was made, and ſome perſons ſlaine vpon either part, which the Earle perceiuing, preſently yeelded, deſiring onely that he might bee ciuilly vſed, and that he might haue an honorable triall; and ſo being firſt brought to Lambet-houſe, where an howre or two he remained with the Lord Archbiſhoppe (his euer moſt louing, but then moſt mournefull friend) was thence with ſome other Lords and Gentlemen conuaied by water to the Tower, about ten of the clocke the ſame night: hauing then experience, that vaine is the loue of the Commons to a Subiect (how great ſoeuer) when it is counterballanced with the dutifull obedience vnto their Prince.

Eſſex arraigned and condemned.

(344) Vpon the nineteenth of the ſame moneth, the Earle of Eſſex and Southampton were arraigned at Weſtminſter, the Lord Buckhurſt Lord high Treaſurer of England, being made Lord Steward for the day, where the great reſolution of the one, contemning death, and the ſweet temper of the other well deſeruing life, did breed moſt compaſſionate affections in all men, hearing the ſentence of Law to paſſe vpon them. The one of them remained priſoner in the Tower during the raigne of the Queene, and by the gracious clemency of our ſoueraigne Kord King Iames at his comming to the Crown, had pardon of life, and reſtauration of blood, the other (Eſſex) the fiue and twentieth of February, being Aſhwedneſday, ſuffered vpon the greene within the Tower, rendring his ſoule to God with a moſt penitent and Chriſtian conſtancy, whoſe laſt ſpeeches were to this effect.

Is Executed.

His ſpeech at death.

(345) "My Lords and Chriſtian bretheren, who 'are preſent witneſſes of my iuſt puniſhment, I 'confeſſe (to Gods Glory) my ſelfe a moſt wretched ſinner, and that my ſinnes in number ex "ceed the haires of my head; that good which I "would haue done, that did I not, and the euill "which I would not, that did I. For all which I "beſeech my Sauiour Chriſt to bee a Mediator to "his Father my God, eſpecially for this my laſt "ſinne, this great, this crying, this bloudy, this "infectious ſinne, wherein, through loue of mee, "ſo many haue beene drawen to offend God, their "Soueraigne, and the world. I beſeech God, her "Maieſty, and the State, to forgiue vs; and I be-"ſeech him to bleſſe her with a proſperous raigne, "with a wiſe and vnderſtanding heart, to bleſſe the "Nobles and Miniſters of the Church and State. "I likewiſe beſeech you, and all the world, to hold "a charitable opinion of mee, for my intention "towards her Maieſty, whoſe death (I proteſt) "I neuer meant, nor any violence towards her Per-"ſon. I thanke God, I neuer was Atheiſt, in not "beleeuing the Scriptures: neither Papiſt, truſting "in my owne merits, but am aſſured to bee ſaued "by the mercies and merits of Chriſt Ieſus my "Sauiour. This faith I was brought vp in, and "herein I am now ready to dye; beſeeching you "all to ioyne your ſoules with mee in praier, that "my ſoule may bee lifted vp by faith, aboue all "earthly things; and firſt I deſire forgiueneſſe of "all the world, euen as freely, as from my heart I "forgiue all the world.

(346) And then kneeling downe, ſaid, I haue beene diuers times in places of danger, where death was neither ſo preſent nor ſo certaine, and yet euen then I felt the weakneſſe of my fleſh, and therefore now in this laſt and great conflict, I deſire Gods aſſiſtance by his preſeruing Spirit. And ſo with * a moſt heauenly praier, and faithfull conſtancy, (as if his ſoule were then already in heauenly fruition) hee humbled himſelfe to the blocke, and ſpreading abroad his armes (the ſigne that he had giuen to his headſ-man) his head was with three ſtrokes of the Axe ſeuered from his body, the great heauineſſe of all men, appearing as well by their countenances, as ſpleene againſt his Executioner, who was in danger of his life at his returne, had not the Sheriffes aſſiſted him to his home.

* See this his praier and other his ſpeeches at large in Stowes Annals p. 1406.

Others executed

(347) For acceſſaries and chiefe Counſelors in this offence, died at Tyborne, Sir Gilliam Merricke Knight, and Henry Cuffe (for his exquiſite learning much bewailed of all men) and fiue daies after them, vpon the Scaffold on Tower Hill, were beheaded Sir Charles Daners and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt Knights. And before any of theſe, Thomas Lee a Captaine was executed, for words ſpoken touching the Earle of Eſſex his deliuerance, to moue, or rather to inforce the Queene thereunto, as his words were conſtrued, who neuertheleſſe confidently tooke his death, that hee neuer had thought of any violent attempt.

The griefe conceiued for the Earle of Eſſex his death.

(348) As the death of this Noble-man was much lamented by the ſubiects, (whoſe loue towards him was ſo ingrafted, as I thinke, I may well ſay, neuer ſubiect had more) ſo her Maieſty likewiſe hauing ſuch a Starre fallen from her firmament, was inwardly mooued, and outwardly oftentimes would ſhew paſhons of her griefe, euen till the time of her approaching end, when two yeeres after ſhee laid downe her Head in the Graue, as the moſt reſplendent Sunne ſetteth at laſt in a Weſterne cloud.

A briefe ſhadow of Queene Elizabeths due praiſes.

(349) The ſtate of which Great Queene throughout the whole courſe of her moſt flouriſhing raigne, was (as in part you haue ſeene ſhadowed already) ſo beautified & ſtrengthened with all honourable perfections, both of Peace, and warre, as neuer any Monarch raigned with greater obſeruance of her owne, nor ruled with a more obſerued magnanimity toward forraine Nations: inſomuch, as if her incomparable vertues & praiſes were truly and exactly deſcribed (a worke worthy ſome noble ſpirit and penne) wee are verily perſwaded, that future ages will ſome what ſtagger & doubt, whether ſuch celebration celibration of her, were not rather affectionately Poeticall, then faithfully Hiſtoricall.

Her ſway and eſtimation in forraine Countries.

(350) For, the great affaires of Europe mainely depended vpon her directions, who ſitting at the Helme of the Shippe (as Fronto ſpake of Antoninus the Emperour) arbitrated and guided their eſtates both in peace and warre: Spaine, ſeeking to ouerflow all, was beaten backe, & ſcarcely able to maintaine her owne bankes: In France, the houſe of Valoys vnder-propped by her counſell; that of Bourboons, aduanced by her countenance, forces, and treaſure; Scotland releeued by her loue; Neatherlands by her power; Portingals King by her bounty, Poland by her commiſeration; likewiſe Germany, Denmarke, Sueueland, often tooke vp and laide downe Armes at her becke and diſpoſe. Neither could the vtmoſt bounds of Europe, (the Ruſſians and Tartars) containe the limits and extent of her great fame; but that the ſame pierced further into the remoter parts of Aſia, Africa, Amercia, among the Turkes. (whoſe great Emperour, in honour of ſo great a Mediatreſſe, granted peace vnto the Polonians outworne with warres,) among the Perſians, Barbarians, Indians, and where not? In moſt of whoſe Dominions to the great enriching of her Kingdome, ſhee ſetled commerce for encreaſe of merchandize, and got large priuiledges for encouragment of her Merchants, whom ſhee cheriſhed as a moſt neceſſary and important part of her Weale-Publike.

Her princely qualities.

(351) Who, for her royall actions and Princely qualities of Minde (ſeated alſo in ſuch a Body as for ſtate, ſtature, beauty, and Maieſty, beſt befitted an Empreſſe,) may be ſingled out for an Idea of an abſolute Prince, her Sex onely excepted, which yet made her vertues more remarke able, as beeing (and ſo reputed by Strangers) of all the Princes of her time, the moſt exact obſeruer (both for Action and Ceremony,) of true Regall deportment and magnificence. For her enterprizes as fortunate as Ceſar, for life, loue, wiſedome, and magnanimity, another Auguſtus; by her peaceable raigne ſhutting the Temple of Warre in England (whiles all Nations round about her felt the miſeries of warre) as hee did the doores of Ianus in Rome. And yet had ſhee Warriers like vnto the Worthies of Dauid, her forraine imployments, Nauigations, and diſcoueries, hauing bred ſuch numbers of moſt renowned Captaines, both for Sea and Land, as none of our former Princes haue ſeene the like. With which neceſſary kinde of noble Seruitors, that her owne Kingdome might bee alwaies munified (as foreſeeing the vncertainties and ſudden changes in the Peace-pretending amities of forraine Princes,) ſhee euer imploied many of her Gentry and others, in the warres of Princes abroad, ſo to perfect them for all occurrents of their Country at home; which alſo induced her (ſome Statiſts haue thought) to ſuffer that long lingring protraction of her Iriſh warres, the rather, to keepe in vre and exerciſe, the skill and valour of her Engliſh. By which meanes, the ſpreading fame and *extent of her Empire was ſuch, that ſhee might ſeeme a ſecond Traian, who laid the circuite of the Romans the largeſt; hauing not onely ſo powerfull a Nauy ſtill in readineſſe, as whereby ſhee attained the Soueraignty of the Sea, but ſo famous Sea-men alſo, as that, vnder her auſpicious Raigne, *twice was the whole Globe of the Terreſtriall World ſailed round about.

Her Military prouidence.

(352) Neither leſſe was her renowne for thoſe other vertues which are the attendants of Peace; her Clemency, Iuſtice, and * Temperance: touching the laſt of which, as in one kind (of her diet and priuate life,) King Edward her brother vſually called her, his Lady Temper: ſo of another kinde of temperance in this learnedſt of Queenes, the * learnedſt of Kings hath giuen this memorable teſtimony, that when as France (part of her Royall Title) was in ciuill warres, Spaine (her mortall Enemy) enfeebled both in power and purſe, Netherland ambitious of her gouernment, and Scotland ruled by an Infant, yet in ſuch abundance both of meanes, opportunities, and prouocations, ſo ſuperabundant was her moderation and temper, that ſhee euer religiouſly abſtained from all ambitious deſire of encrochment on the rights or territories of any her neighbour Princes. Beeing in this, and thoſe other her vertuous actions, ſuch as of whom that which was ſpoken of Antoninus Pius, may more truly bee verified, that ſcarcely, in youth ſhee did any thing raſhly, or in her age indiſcreetly; ſcarcely, I ſay: for as a Creature, wee cannot exempt her from all frailties, as a Woman, from paſſions, or as a Prince, from all errors, whereinto, euen againſt her owne naturall inclination, ſhe might be drawen, either on miſinformation, or on opinion of neceſſity in the State. For her Court, it was not onely a frequent Academie, of as Honourable Councellers, Illuſtrious Peeres, Gallant Courtiers, Learned Profeſſors, Intelligent Statiſts, as euer attended any Chriſtian Prince, but alſo a Nurſery, where yongue Nobles and others might bee trained vp to the managing of greateſt affaires, and a Sanctuary where the meaneſt might finde releeſe againſt the mightieſt; becauſe as the Wiſeſt in her Councell were content to learne wiſdome from her directions, ſo the Greateſt were drawne to practiſe Equity, both by her example and command. Yea, which is more admirable in her Sex, ſo reſerued was ſhee from giuing any man too-much intereſt, or being lead and ouerſwaied by any of her Great ones about her, that they all ſtood in a reuerent awe of her very preſence and aſpect; but much more of her leaſt frowne or checke, wherewith ſome of them who thought they might beſt preſume of her fauor, haue been ſo ſuddenly daunted and Planet-ſtricken, that they could not lay downe their griefe thereof, but in their graues. A thing ſo much the ſtranger, conſidering otherwiſe her incomparable meekneſſe, and gracious countenance and demeanours towards her people, who neuer ſatiated with her ſight and preſence, were no otherwiſe affected with ioy and wondering thereat, (though they beheld her neuer ſo often) then if they had beheld ſome Angelicall Creature.

Her Councell.

Her awe.

Her Meekneſſe.

Her loue amongſt her ſubiects.

Her Learning.

(353) Theſe Soueraigne Arts of Maieſticall rule, were maruellouſly poliſhed and perfected by her exquiſite learning, and inſight in the Arts Liberall: for which if the Emperour Hadrian bee ſo highly commended, much more muſt this learned Empreſſe, who further to perfect her ſolid knowledge, read euery Authour in his owne Originall, and anſwered moſt Nations Ambaſſadours in their owne languages. Yea, ſo farre was ſhee deuoted to learning and the profeſſors thereof, that in honour of it and them, ſhee purpoſely went to the Vniuerſity of Offord twice, and once to Cambridge, at each time there ſpending many whole dayes together, at the Academicall Exerciſes, and diſputations of their chiefeſt learned men in all faculties. In both which noble Academies, ſhee left not onely the deare remembrances of her gracious loue, deliuered to them publikely in her Princely and Eloquent Orations, but much more teſtified in her Princely bounty, by enacting a Law for the doubling (almoſt) of the yeerely reuenewes of all their noble foundations. Thus ſpent ſhe her time and cares in cheriſhing wiſdome in others, and like Sabaes Queene ſeeking to increaſe it in her ſelfe, eſteeming a day ſpent otherwiſe (as Titus was wont to ſay of himſelfe) quite loſt. For which purpoſe euery day all other affaires laide aſide, ſhee ſet apart ſome howres, either to reade, or heare her learned Readers; one of which number, (a* man of excellent learning) profeſſed, that her Inſtructers as oft as they came to her preſence about ſuch employments, receiued ſuch admirable documents from her, that they ſeemed rather to learne of her, then to bring learning to her; and that the learnedſt Authors, as Diuine Plato, and the like, were made more diuine by the learned Commentaries which which ſhee wrote vpon them. In which reſpects, both of noble actions and arts, well may ſhee be paralelled with that euer-renowned Zenobia, who hauing both perfectly read the Roman Story in Greek and alſo her ſelfe abridged the Alexandrian, and all the Orientall hiſtory, thereby attained to ſo high a pitch of wiſdome and authority, that ſhee not onely inſulted vpon the Romans, but held the Arabians, Sarazens, Armenians, and other fierce and intractable people in ſuch obedience, that they neuer durſt ſtirre againſt her.

Her Piety.

(354) But amongſt her volumes (which were very many and choiſeſt) the Booke of God was firſt in her eſteeme, nor laſt in her readings; the pious fruites whereof ſhined brightly throughout the whole courſe aſwell of her priuate life, as publike actions.

Priuate.

In her Priuate; Piety, Sobriety, Purity, Charity, and Chaſtity (maugre the venemous tongues of all Hellborn Slanderers) were her vnſeparable Companions, neuer ſuffering any Lady to approch her ſacred preſence, of whoſe ſtaine ſhe had but the leaſt ſuſpition.

Publike.

For the Publike, the diſtreſſed ſhee releeued, the oppreſſed ſhee ſuccoured, the ouer-borne Princes ſhee aided, the proud ſhee amated, and alwayes ouermaſtered to her laſting memory, and England's glory. But moſt eſpecially ſhined her zeale to God (on whoſe onely Prouidence and reflexe of her owne vnſtained Conſcience, ſhee repoſed againſt all affronts of the world) in preſeruing his true Church and worſhip, both from the pollutions of Idolatry, and frenzies of Noueliſts; her Kingdome being a receptacle, and Court a Sanctuary for the baniſhed Proteſtants, as was the Pallace of Conſtantius (the husband of our Helena) for the perſecuted Chriſtians, when he ſate Emperour of the weſt in this Iland of Britaine. Whereby as in her life time ſhee attained to be ſtyled by forraine Churches; ſo at here death was ſhee by them generally lamented, as the Nurſing mother of the French, Dutch, Italian, Exiles for Chriſts name, & the vnconquered Defendereſſe of the whole true Chriſtian Religion.

Beza in Ep. præfix Comment. in Iob.

(355) Thus ſhe liued, raigned, and dyed in Peace, and full of glory, celebrated by the tongues and pennes of the rareſt ſpirits of all Nations (yea euen enemies) of her time: till laſtly the God of Peace called her to a farre higher glory, by his vnpartiall meſſenger death, who ſeized on her at her Manour of Richmond. Her ſickeneſſe was accompanied with a deepe melancholy, wherein, as ſhee gaue ſignes of death vnto the learned Phyſitians, ſo great aſſurance of her eternall life, vnto all the worthy Prelates emploied about her: manifeſting (euen when ſilence oppreſſed her tongue) by liuely ſignes at their praiers and ſpeeches, how ſhe reioyced with the Apoſtle, that ſhe had fought a good fight, finiſhed her courſe, and kept the faith, hoping for the Crowne of righteouſneſſe, that the Lord the righteous Iudge had laid vp for her againſt that great day. And ſo her ſoule departed this fleſh (the earthen veſſell wherein ſo many heauenly endowments had beene treaſured) beeing borne vp by the Angels vnto the fruitions of endleſſe bliſſe, the twentie fourth of March, the yeere of Saluation 1602, of her owne age, ſixty nine, ſixe moneths, and ſeuenteene dayes, and of her glorious Raigne the forty fourth yeere, foure moneths, and ſeuenth day; as well beloued and as much lamented as euer was Prince; admired, fauoured, and feared as the worlds wonder and heauens darling: being the laſt in order of thoſe Monarchs who had long raigned ouer the Southpart of this Iland, and the greateſt in fame that euer ruled before her, as if all their vertues had made a confluence in her, that ſo glorious a Monarchy might not haue ended but with ſo glorious a period.

THE TENTH BOOKE.

A.D. 1602.

BEfore the conceiued ſorrowes, for the death of the late renowned Queen could fully bee diſſolued into teares, or thoſe get paſſage from the heart to the eyes, the conduit was ſtopped with a ſudden ioy, and all faces cleared, before that ſad penſiueneſſe had therein ſet her full print. The ſtate of England ſtanding that day, like vnto that of Iudah, wherein the foundation of the ſecond Temple was laid, whoſe ancient men mourned, as doubting the glory thereof could not be anſwerable to that of Salomons; but as they were comforted by a Prophet from GOD, That the glory of the later ſhould ſurmount the former, ſo all Engliſh hearts by a diuine bleſſing from GOD, were preſently cheered, when they ſaw their Morning Starre ariſe in the North, whoſe Pole with His attractiue Power, long long before had drawne the Needle of the Southerne Compaſſe vnto that One point.

March 24. (2) Immediately vpon the death of the Queene, the Lords of the Land gaue full ſatisfaction vnto the people, in proclaimiug IAMES the Sixt, King of Scotland, by the name of Iames the Firſt, King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. to the vnſpeakeable comfort of all true Engliſh, as well for his vnqueſtionable claime, as for that hee profeſſed the ſame true Religion (whoſe preſeruation was their tender care) as alſo for his ſingular learning and experience, whereby hee was accompliſhed to vndergoe the managing of ſo great an Empire, hauing now attained to thirty ſixe yeeres, nine moneths, and fiue dayes, exerciſed altogether in the practiſe of Kingly gouernement, from the very firſt dayes of his infancy.

King James proclaymed.

(3) That his Title was moſt iuſt, no man can denie, being ſprung from the vnited Roſes of Lancaſter and Yorke, King Henry the ſeauenth, and Queene Elizabeth his wife: whoſe Iſſue by the Male, failing in the late deceaſed Queene Elizabeth of glorious memory, the off-ſpring of Margaret their eldeſt daughter, was the next Heire, which Lady married vnto Iames, the fourth King of Scotland; by him had iſſue King Iames the fifth, whoſe onely Daughter Queene Mary was Mother of this our mighty Monarch. Let Doleman therefore dote vpon his owne dreames, and other like Traytors faſhion their barres vpon the Popes forge; yet hath God and his right ſet him on the Throne of his moſt lawfull inheritance, ſo to vnite the two Crownes into one: Gods omnipotent arme bringing at laſt that to paſſe, which had often beene aſſayed, but could not bee effected by any power of man. For, did not Edward our firſt, the terror of Syria, and Edward the ſixt, our godly Ioſias, both of them diſtreſſe Scotland with their warres, onely to haue made an vnion by the marriages of their next Heires. But the time being not come, and all other preceding Princes failing of their purpoſes, the peaceable vnion of thoſe two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, as alſo of two other, France and Ireland, was reſerued for Him, who is a patterne of all Princely Learning and Piety, vnto all other Monarchs vpon the ſurface of the Earth.

King Iames his iuſt title to the Crowne of England.

King James appointed by God to vnite the two Kingdomes.

(4) But theſe calme proceedings without any oppugnancy, as they were moſt ioyfull to the Engliſh, ſo were they admirable vnto other forraine Nations, yea, and enuied at of ſome, eſpecially ſuch as hoped for an alteration, or at leaſt-wiſe a toleration of Religion. And ſo much the rather, for that Pope Clement the eight, had ſent the yeere before vnto Henry Garnet, Superior of the Ieſuites in England, two Bulles to the contrary; one to the Clergy, and the other to the Laity. The Title of the former was, Dilectis filijs Archipresbytero, & reliquo Clero Anglicano, &c. the later, Dilectis filijs, Principibus, & Nobilibus, Catholicis Anglicanis, ſalutem & Apoſtolicam Benedictionem: the ſumme of both, thus. To our beloued ſonnes, the Arch-Prieſt and the Clergy, the Peeres and Nobles, Catholikes of England, greeting, and Apoſtolicall Benediction, &c. The tenor was, that after the death of her Maieſty, whether by courſe of Nature, or otherwiſe: Whoſoeuer ſhould lay claime or title to the Crowne of England, though neuer ſo directly, and neerely intereſſed by diſcent, ſhould not be admitted vnto the Throne; vnleſſe he would firſt tolerate the Romiſh Religion, and by all his beſt endeauours promote the Catholike cauſe, vnto which, by a ſolemne and ſacred Oath, he ſhould religiouſly ſubſcribe, after the death of that Miſerable Woman: for ſo it pleaſed his Holineſſe to tearme Elizabeth, that moſt great and happy Queene. By vertue of which Buls, (if vertue may be in any ſuch vicious Libels) the Ieſuites diſſwaded the Romiſh-minded Subiects from yeelding (in any wiſe) obedience vnto King Iames, as being not an obedient Catholike ſonne; but this not working to their wiſhed effect, and He now ſolemnly proclaimed with an vniuerſall applauſe, loue, and peace, their hopes began to grow cold, and no ſuccours from Spaine being now to be expected, Garnet, the Superiour, to auoid further dangers, ſacrificed theſe hunger-ſtarued Buls to Vulcan the fiery God.

A. D. 1603 King Iames commeth to London

(5) King Iames in Scotland, receiuing intelligence of the moſt plauſible paſſages to this enlargement of his Stile and Dominions, prepared himſelfe hitherward, and vpon the ſixt of Aprill came to Barwicke, thence to Wytherington, Newcaſtle, Durham, Yorke, Dancaſter, Newarke, Burleigh, Roiſton, Theobalds, and thence to London vpon the ſeuenth of May. In all which places hee was moſt royally and ioyouſly receiued, with all demonſtrations of trueſt loyalty, loue, and obedience, which was no leſſe benignely accepted of by his Maieſty, who the better to manifeſt his royall diſpoſition, in all ſuch places as hee came, where Gayoles for offenders were kept, out of his clemency moſt graciouſly ſet free the Priſoners, (thoſe onely excepted, who lay for treaſon, murther, or Romiſh diſloyalty) diſburſing alſo large ſummes of money for releaſe of many others from their creditors.

His Progreſſe and places of entertainement.

His Mercy extended to the Priſoners.

(6) In all which progreſſe, admirable was the confluence of people, which with haſte to meete him, ſeemed rather to flie then to runne, and ſuch were their ſhoutes of ioy, that the hils reſounded the Echo thereof, euen vp to the Heauens, which had beene ſo propitious, as to beſtow on them ſo good a King, which moſt abundantly appeared the day that his Maieſty remoued from Theobalds to London, when at Stanford-hill, neere vnto Totnam-high Croſſe in Middleſex, the City of London (repreſented in the L. Maior, the Aldermen, with fiue hundred choyce Citizens, all in Chaines of gold, and very well mounted) met his Maieſty, and with all ſolemne obſeruance attended Him vnto the Charter-Houſe neere Smithfield, which was moſt ſumptuouſly furniſhed for his royall entertainement. On which very day, a Proclamation came forth againſt all griping Monopolies that hindred commerce, and Protections that ſtopped the due proceedings of Law, as alſo againſt other abuſes in other inferiour carriages. All which were ſo acceptable to the People and Common-wealth, (which had been too much eaten-out with ſuch Locuſts and Caterpillers) as neuer any King wanne himſelfe more loue: theſe being accepted as the auſpicious beginnings, promiſing moſt happy ſequels. So that His entrance was as another Conſtantine, whoſe perſon euery man prayed for, and deſired to ſee: and for Peace, another Octauius, hauing ruled peaceably a ſtout ſtirring Nation, euen from his yonger yeeres, and liued in peace with all the Princes and Kings of the Earth: in which peace now laſtly hee brought the Crowne and Kingdome of Scotland to augment the glory, circuit and ſtrength of this Realme of England, in whoſe vnited body, as a faire branched Tree, euen at the firſt hee began to engraft the Scyences of his Princely vertues, which by the ſappe and Sunne-ſhine of his iuſt gouernement ſtill ſpread more and more, like vnto the Cedars that grow vpon Lebanon.

The ioy that was conceiued at the ſight of his Maieſty.

His Maieſties comming to London.

His Maieſties firſt proceedings to maintaine law and commerce.

(7) The Engliſh Empire thus peaceably eſtabliſhed, both by, and vnto this peaceable Monarch: from ſundry forraine Princes were ſent Ambaſſadors, to congratulate his entrance; as namely, from the Palſgraue of the Rheine, one of the Princes Electors for the Emperour of the Romans: from the French King Mounſieur de Roſny, Great Treaſurer of France: from the Spaniſh King, Don Iohn de Taſſis: from the States of Holland and Zeland: from the Arch-Duke of Auſtria: from the Signiory of Venice: from the Duke of Florence, and from others.

Diuers Ambaſſadors came into England to congratulate his entrance.

(8) But among all new-commers, none was more admired, nor gazed on, then was Hugh Oneal, Earle of Tir-Oen, that perfidious, (but very valiant) ſubtile, and ſmooth-tongued Traytor, and Boutefeu of Ireland, that had beene the death of many a worthy man: who hauing (as we haue ſhewed) yeelded himſelfe to the Lord Generall Mountioy, in the sickeneſſe of the late Queene, was now by him brought vnto Englands Court, to the Generals great honour, and Tir-Oens great good, if he could haue had grace to containe himſelfe. For not onely was hee taken vpon his lowly ſubmiſſion into fauour with his dread Soueraigne, and reſtored to his former eſtate and dignity, (a very great fauour to ſo great an offender) but a Proclamation was alſo made in his behalfe, and for his ſecurity, that hee ſhould of all men bee honourably vſed, (a grace ſeldome ſhewed a Traytor) becauſe as it ſeemed, his guilty conſcience ſurcharged with bloud, feared the hand of euery man that beheld his face; and indeed many Women enraged for loſſe of their Husbands, and Sonnes, furiouſly deſired and aſſayed to quench their hatred with his bloud: in which perplexity wee will leaue him for a reſtleſſe Rebell, who laſtly like a fugitiue left againe both his loyalty, and his owne Countrey.

And hated.

Trophies ſet vp in London ſtood long vnfiniſhed.

(9) In the meane while the ſolemnities for the Coronation were prepared, and many ſtately Trophies (no leſſe due to the conſeruation of Peace, then to the atchieuings of Warre) in London ſtreets ſet vp, which by reaſon of the great ſickneſſe in that City then cruelly raging, ſtood a long time rather like the ruines of ſome old decay, then the Princely Pageants of a new Triumph. For before the appointed day of Coronation (which was the twenty fifth of Iuly, being the Feaſt day of Saint Iames the Apoſtle) a Proclamation came forth, that no Londoner ſhould preſume to approach to the Court, the City hauing buried that weeke aboue a thouſand of the plague. But yet a greater plague to the Land then this, was intended ſome weekes before, had not the prouidence of a good GOD preuented the deſignes of mercileſſe men. For, certaine Italianated Prieſts, boyling in reuengefull rancor, becauſe their plots and hopes (which they vainely promiſed themſelues for aduancement of their Religion) were now paſt all appearance of poſſibility or ſucceſſe, and combining with ſome other of better Ranke and Note, whom priuate diſcontents had whetted on to a publike miſchiefe; contriued together a deſperate deſigne, for ſurprize of the Kings Perſon, and Prince Henry his Sonne. Of forces to effect it, they made no doubt, meaning to retaine them priſoners in the Tower, and with the Treaſures therein to maintaine their intent, or, if the Tower were impugnable, then to carry them to Douer Caſtle, and there by violence either to obtaine their owne pardons, a toleration in Religion, and a remouall of ſome Counſellors of the State, or elſe to put ſome further proiect in execution. To conceale this Treaſon, Watſon the Prieſt deuiſed Oaths for ſecrecy, and himſelfe with Clarke (another Prieſt alſo) taught, that the act was lawfull, being done before the Coronation, for that the King was no King, before hee was Annointed, and the Crowne ſolemnely ſet on his head.

The intents of the Conſpirators

A Doctrine well ſitting ſuch Doctors.

(10) The other perſons whoſe loyalty was likewiſe called into queſtion, as inuolued in the attempt, were Henry Brooke, Lord Cobham, and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Thomas Lord Gray of Wilton, Sir Walter Raughley, Lord Warden of the Stanneries, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sir Edward Parham Knights, George Brooke, and Bartholmew Brooksby Eſquires, and Anthony Copley, a Gentleman; all which parties being apprehended, were committed ſome to the Gate-Houſe at Weſtminſter, others to the Tower of London. Meane while (notwithſtanding the raging ſickneſſe) the day for the Coronation (being the Feaſt of Saint Iames) was celebriouſly kept, with all ſolemne performance, and ancient Rites of the Engliſh Kings, in the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter in weſtminſter. Where, the antique Regall Chaire of Inthronation, did bleſſedly receiue, with the Perſon of his Maieſty, the full accompliſhment alſo of that Propheticall prediction of this

For euen there now the ſacred Oyle was powred vpon the Royall Perſons of King Iames and Queene Anne, by the moſt Reuerend Prelate, Iohn Whitgift, Lord Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Princeſſe and Peeres wearing their Robes and Coronets, the Officers giuing attendance in their places, and the Lord Maior of London in a Gowne of Crimſon Veluet, with the Aldermen in Scarlet: twelue principall Citizens were admitted to attend them, all other forbidden becauſe of the plague.

(11) As the great ſolitude of the City of London by reaſon of this infection, and the retiredneſſe both of his Maieſty and all his Nobles, gaue ſome hopes to the fore-mentioned Prieſts and their Abettors, for the eaſier accompliſhing their plots: ſo was it alſo ſome occaſion of the delay of Iuſtice on them, after their treaſonous deſignes were now fully brought to light. Wherefore, London continuing ſtill vnfit for ſuch a tryall, and requiſite concourſe of Peeres and people, Wincheſter, the Tearme being there kept, was the place deſigned for their arraignement, whether they were all conueyed vnder ſtrong guard. The firſt who there * came to their tryall, were George Brooke, Brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edward Parham, Brooksby, Copley, Watſon, and Clarke; whoſe inditement was, that they had conſpired; firſt, to deſtroy the King; ſecondly, to raiſe Rebellion; thirdly, to alter Religion; fourthly, to ſubuert the State; and laſtly, to procure forraine Inuaſion. That theſe their intents they had made knowne vnto the Lord Gray, whom they meant ſhould haue beene Earle Marſhall of England, Watſon Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treaſurer, and Sir Griffin Markham Secretary. That with the King, the Lords alſo ſhould bee ſurprized in their Chambers at Greenewich, and the Lord Maior and Aldermen of London ſhould be ſent for, and ſo be ſhut vp in the Tower.

Their inditements and condemnations.

(12) George Brooke hereunto anſwered (with a colour and pretext as lewd as the attempt) that hee had Commiſſion from the King to doe what he did, onely to try faithfull Subiects; which commiſſion hee could not produce. Sir Griffin Markham (excepting onely the imputation of bloud) confeſſed his offence very penitently, alleaging it was through a diſcontented mind, and deſired the Lords to bee a meane to the King for mercy. Watſon and Clarke (the former of which confeſſed he had drawen all thoſe Gentlemen into theſe plots) did vainely and ignorantly auerre, that they held the King no King, vntill he was Crowned; and that therefore it could not be Treaſon: alleaging, that Saul was not King, vntill he was choſen in Mizpeh, though he had beene Annointed in Ramah by Samuel the Prophet; neither Ieroboam, who in the dayes of Salomon, had beene confirmed by the Prophet to raigne ouer Iſrael, vntill the people made him King vpon the fooliſh anſweres of Rehoboam. Thus theſe great Rabbies made no difference betwixt the mediate and ordinary ſucceſſion of lawfull Princes, ordained by God to be his Vice-gerents in fully eſtabliſhed Common-weales, and thoſe Kings which himſelfe extraordinarily aduanced, and erected to be the whips in his hand; as the firſt manifeſtly proued, when they had caſt off Samuel, and the larter allotted to no other end, as by the Prophet is apparant, where God to him ſaith, I gaue them a King in mine anger, and I tooke

November 17.

Sir Walter Raughley arraigned and condemned.

(13) Two dayes after was Sir Walter Raughley brought to the Barre, beeing indited for combining with the Lord Cobham (his accuſar) in the foreſaid deſignes. Whereunto he pleaded not guilty, and ſo ſtood for his purgation, as hee held argument from morning till night, to the hearers no little admiration, that a man of ſo exquiſite vnderſtanding and experience ſhould giue conſent vnto ſuch a plot, no leſſe foule, then fooliſh. Yet in fine hee was found guilty, and had ſentence of death.

The Lords Cobham and Gray arraigned and condemned.

(14) The like iudgement, a few dayes after, paſſed vpon the Lords, Cobham and Grey, arraigned on two ſeuerall dayes. The former being indited, for combining with Sir Walter Raughley & George Brooke, to procure forces from the King of Spaine and the Arch-Duke, for an Inuaſion, &c, the other for ioyning with the foreſaid Prieſts, Knights, and Gentlemen, in their fore-mentioned conſpiracies. The Lord Chancellor of England, beeing Lord Steward for that ſeruice, ſate vnder a Cloth of Eſtate in the vpper end of the Hall, the Nobles ſitting (as their Peeres and Iudges) on benches vpon both ſides. Thoſe at the Barre he willed to bee hold, and to anſwere without feare: the Kings learned Councell he intreated not to confound the memory of the priſoners with vnneceſſary matters: and the Peeres, though vnſworne, hee aduiſed to try indifferently betwixt the King and the arraigned; who both pleading not guilty, were yet found otherwiſe by the Court, and receiued iudgement of death.

Watſon and Clarke vpon the 29. of Nouember.

(15) Of all theſe arraigned, Sir Edward Parham only was acquitted by the Iury, and of all the reſt onely three died, which were Watſon, Clarke, and Maſter George Brooke: the firſt of which, hauing at large laid open in Print, the Treaſons and vnſufferable machinations of the Ieſuiticall Order, left this ſuſpition on them at his death, that they, in reuenge, had cunningly and couertly drawen him into this Action, which brought him to this ſhamefull end. After whoſe death, his Maieſty then at Wilton, (hauing commanded his Lords, to deliuer the true narration vnto him of the whole proceeding in the arraignements and anſweres of all the reſt) ſigned alſo a warrant for the execution of the Lords Cobham and Gray, as alſo Markham, to be performed the Friday following before ten of the clock in the morning. Notwithſtanding his Maieſty more mooued to milde mercy, then the high ſtraine of Iuſtice, of his Princely and free clemency, gaue life vnto thoſe perſons, expecting preſent Death, and thus with his owne hand wrote to counterchecke his former Warrant.

The Kings Letters for ſtay of the Execution.

(16) Although it bee true, that all vell gouernid and flooriſhing Kingdomes and Common vealthis aire eſtabliſhid by Iuſtice, and that theſe tuo Noblemen by birth, that aire now vpon the point of execution, aire for their treaſonable practiſes condemnid by the Law, and adiudgit voorthy of the execution thaireof, to the exemple and terror of otheris: The one of thaim hauing filthily practiſed the ouerthrow of the quhole Kingdome, and the other for the ſurpriſe of our owin Perſonne: yet in regaird that this is the firſt yere of our Raigne in this Kingdome, and that neuer King was ſo farre obleiſhid to his People as ve haue beene to this, by our entry here vith ſo hairty and generall an applauſe of all ſorts. Among quhom all the kinne, friendis, and allies of the ſaidis condemnid perſonis, vaire as forduart and duetifull as any other our good Subiectis, as alſo that at the very time of thair Arrainement none did more freely and readily giue thair aſſent to thair conuiction, and to deliuer thaim into the handis of Iuſtice, then ſo many of thair neereſt Kinſmen and Allies (as beeing Peeris) vaiere vpon thair Iury; as likeuaiſe in regard that Iuſtice hath in ſome ſort gottin courſe already, by the execution of the tuo Prieſtis, and George Brooke, that vaire the principall plottars and intiſairs of all the reſt, to the embraſing of the ſaidis treaſonabill Machinations, vee therefore (being reſolued to mixe Clemency vith Iuſtice) aire contented, and by theſe Preſentis command you, our preſent Sheriffe of Hampſhire to ſuperſeid the Execution of the ſaidis tuo Noblemen and to take thaim backe to thair priſon againe, quhile our further pleaſure be knowin. And ſince ve vill not haue our Lawis to haue reſpect to perſonis in ſparing the great, and ſtrikking the meaner ſort; It is our pleaſure, that the like courſe be alſo taken vith Marckham, beeing ſorry from our hairt, that ſuch is, not onely the heynous nature of the ſaidis condemnid perſonis crime, but euen the corruption is ſo great of thair naturall diſpoſition, as the care ve haue for the ſafety and quiet of our State and good Subiectis, vill not permit vs to vſe that Clemency towardis thaim, quhich in our owin naturall inclination, vee micht very eaſily be perſvadid vnto.

The Kings mercifull repriue of the Priſoners ready to dy.

(17) This Letter thus framed, the deliuery thereof his Maieſty committed vnto one Iohn Gibb a Scottiſh Gentleman, a diſcreet perſon, and free from dependancy of any Noble man or Counſellor, neither was he of any extraordinary ranke, as well that the by-ſtanders ſhould not obſerue any alteration for the execution, as the delinquents themſelues take any apprehenſion by his preſence, to the end that each of them ſeuerally ſhould prepare to breth out their laſt breath, with a true confeſſion of their ſecret conſciences. The time approching, Sir Griffin Markham brought to the Scaffold, (to that end erected on the Caſtle Greene) made himſelfe ready for the ſtroke of the Axe, when ſecretly Maſter Gibb deliuered vnto the high * Sheriffe of the Shire the Kings Warrant to the contrary, who ſoone perceiuing his Maieſties intent tooke backe the priſoner, (as if he were firſt to confront the two Lords in the Hall vpon ſome ſeruice to the King,) from the Scaffold, and brought him into the Caſtle Hall. Then was the Lord Gray brought forth, who hauing powred out his prayers vnto God, at length kneeling downe for the ſtroke of death, the Sheriffe bad ſtay, telling the Lord that ſome further ſeruice was expected of him, and thereupon likewiſe led him againe into the Caſtle. The Lord Cobham then was broght to the Scaffold, who being in prayers and preparation for death, the Lord Gray and Sir Griffin were brought backe againe, where the priſoners all three appearing together on the Scaffold, the Sheriffe notified his Maieſties Warrant for the ſtay of their Executions, and that as then they ſhould not dy. Vpon which rare Clemency, vnexpected both of priſoners and ſpectators, aroſe ſuch ſhouts of the people as was wonderfull, crying God ſaue the King, and the condemned ouercome with his Clemency, wiſhed they might ſacrifice their liues to redeem their own faults, and to repurchaſe ſo mercifull a Princes loue.

Sir Griffin Markham returned from the Scaffold

The Lord Cobham Lord Gray and Sir Griffin Markham reprieued.

(18) This buſineſſe thus tranſacted, for the ſafety of the Kings Perſon and whole Kingdome; his Maieſty, (who well conſidered, that the quiet of a Weale-Publike cannot poſſiblie ſubſiſt long, without the peace and well managed gouernment of the Church,) hauing among many other Petitions which were preſented to Him at his firſt entrance, receiued one from certaine perſons of ouer zealous ſpirits, againſt the eſtabliſhed Gouernment and Liturgy in the Engliſh Church, reſolued now by his Princely iudgement, as another Hezekiah to break the Brazen Serpent, if Idolatry were thereunto committed, and like a ſecond Ioſiah, to reade the law of the Lord himſelfe: whereupon by Proclamation hee commanded an aſſembly of ſelected Diuines, ſuch as could beſt deliuer the minds of both parts, to appeare in his Royall preſence, at his Mannor of Hampton-Court: whither the ſummoned accordingly repayred. Christs Church, Worcester, Westminster, Paules, Chester, and Windsor, with Docter Field, & Docter King, the now Lord Bishop of London. To deliuer the Plaintiffes desires, where summoned, & appeared Docter Reynolds and Docter Sparkes of Oxford, M. Knewstubs, and M. Chaderton of Cambridge.

(19) The first sitting was vpon Saterday, the foureteenth of Ianuary, in his Maiesties Priuy-chamber at Hampton-Court, whereinto the Church-Gouernours onely being admitted (by his Maiesties commaund) in the presence of his Priuy Councell, he made a most godly and Princely declaration of his intent, in sommoning this Assembly, in effect, thus; That "this his proceeding was no nouell deuise, but ac- "cording to the example of all Christian Princes, "who in the commencement of their raignes, vsual- "ly take the first course for the establishing of the "Church both for doctrine and Policy, to which "the very Heathen themselues had relation in this "their Prouerbe, á Ioue Principium. And particu- "larly in this land, King Henry the eight, towards the "end of his raig ne, after him King Edward the sixt, "who altred more; after him Queene Mary, who "reuersed all; and the last Queen of famous memo- "ry, who setled the Church state as now it stan- "deth. Wherein yet his Maiesty deemed himselfe "happier then they, in that they were faine to alter "those things which they found established, where- "as himselfe saw yet no cause, so much to change a- "ny thing, as to confirme that which He found so "well setled already. Which State so affected his "Royall heart, that it pleased him, both to enter in- "to a gratulation to almighty God, (at which words "he put off his hat) for bringing him into the land "of Promise, where Religion was purely professed, "where he sate among graue, learned, and reuerend "Diuines, who better knew what belonged to the "State of a King, to the honor and order of a king- "dom, then some other Nations did, and withall to "assure the Prelacy there present, that Hee inten- "ded not any Innouation, acknowledging the Go- "uernement Eccleasiasticall to haue beene approued "by manifold blessings from God himself, both for "the encrease of the Gospell, and with a most happy "and glorious peace. Yet, becaus nothing could "be so absolutely ordered, but that somwhat might "be added, and in any State, as in the body of man, "Corruptions like il humors might insensibly grow "either through time or persons; his purpose was, "after the example of a good Phisitian, to make "search into the supposed diseases, and to examine "the complaints, so to remoue the occasions there- "of, if they proue scandalous, or to cure them, if "they were dangerous, or if but friuolous, yet to take "knowledge of them, thereby at once both to cast "a sop into the mouth of Cerberus, and of all facti- "ous spirits, and withall to giue satisfaction to all "quiet and sober minded men.

His Maiesties Oration vnto the Clergy.

Many alterations in the church since K. Henry 8.

No State without corruption.

(20) His Maiesty concluding this his generall aduertisement, entred more particular discourse with the Bishops (for his owne priuate information) concerning the Booke of Common Prayer, Excommunication in the Ecclesiasticall Courts, and the prouision; of fitte and able Ministers for Ireland. Touching matters in the saide Booke, hee desired satisfaction. First, for Confirmation, which if it were held & so called, as if the Sacrament of Baptisme were therby confirmed, & were inualidous without it, then was it in his iudgement blasphemous: but if it were only that Children, who at their Baptisme made profession of their faith by the mouthes of others, might before the Bishoppes professe it in their owne persons, and so receiue Episcopall Benediction by prayer, and imposition of hands, then was it of very sacred vse in Gods Church. Secondly, for Absolution, which his Maiesty had heard compared to the Pops pardons. Thirdly, for Priuate Baptisme, which hee vtrerly disliked to be administred, but by a lawfull Minister. His second point was Excommunication, wherein hee moued two especiall considerations; the one of the Matter, that the sentence being so waighty, was not to bee pronounced vpon enery slight cause: the other of the Persons, why Lay-men as Chancellors & Commissaries, and not rather the Deane and Chapter, or other graue Ministers and Chaplaines should bee assumed by the Bishops for their assistants therein. The last, which was touching a sufficient Ministery in Ireland, his Maiesty referred to another day.

His Maiesties demands touching some supposed abuses.

Absolution.

Priuate Baptisme

Excommunication.

(21) But his Maiesty receiued ful satisfaction and contentment by the seuerall answeres to all his demands. Touching Confirmation, that the Church of England held it no essentiall part of the Sacrament of Baptisme, but a * practise of the Primitiue Church, yea of the * Apostles, (as * Caluin himselfe expounds their meaning; who also wished the restitution thereof in such Churches where it had beene abolished,) and for imposition of hands on children, warranted by * Christ himselfe, a Custome still retained in our Church, as very godly and necessary for those very reasons and vses, which his Maiesty had mentioned, and truly obserued. Touching Absolution, it was answered, that as Christ desired not the death of sinners, so he hath giuen power and commandement to his Ministers, to pronounce his mercy with remission of sinnes vnto all Penitents, that the practise hereof in the English Church, is so farre from Popery, as that the Reformed Churches of Augusta, Boheme, and Saxony, doe both allow it, and retaine it, yea, and Caluin himselfe approues it. Of Priuate Baptisme it was answered, that though the words seemed somwhat doubtfull, yet the practise of the English Church did contradict all administration of it by Laickes and women, in censuring them in that case: whereupon it was concluded, that a lawfull Minister only should be imployed in times of necessity, when the Infant was in danger of life; yet so vnderstood, that the person was in no wise to be reputed of the Essence of the Sacrament. And finally, for Excommunication, it was there resolued, that the abuses (if any such there were) being remoued and amended, that sacred censure should retaine its necessary vigour in the Church; and so for that day his Maiesty dismissed the Assembly of his Prelates.

(22) Vpon Munday following, being the sixteenth of Ianuary, those other Doctors, who were to relate the dislikes of the Opposites, were called likewise into the Priuy Chamber, where in presence of his Prelates and Peeres, his Maiesty deliuered vnto them, a pithy & Princely declaration of his mind, "That He intended not to innouate the gouerne- "ment now established, which by long experience "he had found accomplished with so singular bles- "sings of God forty fiue yeeres, as that no Church "vpon the face of the earth hath more flourished "then this of England. But rather his meaning, and "earnest desire was, first to setle vniformity through "the whole, for the more quiet and flourishing e- "state thereof: secondly, to plant vnity for the sup- "pression of Papists, and enemies of Religion: third- "ly to amend abuses, as incident to Bodies Politicke, "as the shadow to the body Naturall; which once "getting entrance, hold on as a Wheele doth his "motion, when it is once set on going. Among the "complaints therefore of many greeuances made "since his entrance into England, none was more "weighty, nor himselfe more willing to heare and "amend, then such a might conceme the state of "the Church, if the same did in any wise decline "from the ancient and Apostolicall ruse. For which "cause he had sent for them, whom hee vnderstood "to be graue, learned, & modest Diuines, to heare "by them those greeuances, and seuerall obiections "at large, and desired them boldly to declare the "same.

so godly, so learned, so carefull a King, reduced all matters, either desired or disliked amongst the weake Brethren (whose Spokesman hee protested hee would not haue been, but onely vpon his Maiesties mandatory Summons) vnto those foure heades: 1. for preseruation of true doctrine, 2. for placing of good Pastors, 3. for sincere administration of the Church gouernement; 4 for explanation of some clauses in the Common-prayer Booke. It would bee here too impertinent, to force an historicall Narration with those Theologicall particulars, which vpon those seuerall points were then produced, and are *elsewhere to be found exactly related. Yet as wee cannot but commend the iudgement of these foure Diuines (as touching the third point) in that, finding no iust exception to the Episcopall Hierarchie of our Church, in no one word they impugned or dispaproued the same; so much more must we celebrate the admirall dexterity, iudgement and learning of his sacred Maiesty, ioyned with so rare industry and patience, whose owne accurate search and exquisite expositions of Scriptures, Fathers, and primitiue practises, did there both breed wonder & astonishment in that noble and learned audience, and also giue singular satisfaction (euen to the * agents for the Opposites) touching al the exceptions taken to the Church-state; which his Maiesty now found to be no other then the phantasmes of a scrupulous indiscretion.

*They all promised obedience and Doctor Sparke writ a booke to perswade vnto conformity.

(24) The Wednesday following, being the 18 of Ianuary (appointed for the next meeting) his Maiesty againe, with most of the Lords of his Priuy Councell, entred the Chamber; where the Reuerend Prelates with such others onely as the L. Archbishoppe appointed, (for so his Maiesty cõmanded) being admitted to his Royal presence, after some conference about the High Commission court Subscription, Oath ex officio, and the like, his Maiesty (causing the other foure Diuines to bee then called in) was pleased to declare what formerly had past; and for a conclusion, shut vp all with a godly ex-
"hortation, like another Constantine, perswading
"euery man to vnity, and to a diligent discharge of "their duties, in their seueral places; the superiors to
"gouerne without violence, the inferiors to obey
"without murmuring, and all of them to builde
"Gods Temple without sound of discord; desi"ring and commanding all present, not onely them"selues to labour that way, but to bee a meanes to "draw on all others vnto a peaceable conformity,
"the matters being no other (as now hee saw plaine-
"ly) but of meere weakenesse: wherein persons
"discreet would doubtlesse bee easily henceforward "reclaimed, and for the vndiscreet & reluctant, their "roomes were more behoueful then their seruices:
"by their fruites therefore Hee should discerne and
"iudge them; Obedience and Humility being the "markes of honest and good men, which thence"forth hee would expect from as many as would be "held well affected to his Maiesty and his State.
Which Princely exhortation (deliuered with much more feeling words, and mouing earnestnesse) was so piercing, as it fetched teares from some of both sides, and all vnanimously protested their most dutifull obedience to those his Royall commands.

The conclusion of the Conference.

(25) Besides this maine fruit of this famous conference, the setling of the Church-peace, sundry other important matters (not here to be pretermitted, because necessarily tending to that noble end) were therein also proiected, and by his Maiesties euer prouident care had then their conception, though after-times brought the births to perfection. The first (both in due ranke and vse) was his sacred Decree for a new Translation of the holy Scriptures, vpon a Princely and pious care of Gods eternall Truth according to the Originals, as also for an vniforme reading thereof in the Churches. To which end three selected Companies from Oxford, Cambridge, and in London, most iudicious in the languages and learning being imployed, after long conference, much reading, and diligent comparing of all translations with the ancient originals, it is now most exactly and happily published, as a witnesse to the World both of Gods constant promise, that Heauen and Earth should perish, but his Word should neuer: and also of the Religious care of this his Vice-gerent, in seeking euen at the first, the first thing that man is commanded to seeke after, whose praise shall stand for euer in the Record of that godly worke, and the worke shall iustifie it selfe against all gaine-sayers to Gods eternall glory, and many soules great comfort.

The translation of the Bible intented and commanded.

(26) His second sacred proiect was, that as now in England, so also in Ireland, Wales, and the Northerne parts, true Religion (which Hee there auowed to be the onely band of true obedience) might be throughly planted. Which religious purpose He so zealously prosecuted, especially for the North and all Scotland, as that Hee held it not sufficient to haue ioyned these two Kingdomes into one Temporall Monarchy, vnlesse He might see them both vnited also in the Doctrine, Regiment and Rites of one spirituall Hierarchy. Neither was his Princely wisdome for the meanes lesse conspicuous, then his zeale in the intendment, in making so heedfull choyce of such English Diuines, as were (not long after) in this imployment sent into Scotland; the very first, in which Apostolike Ambassage for establishing those Neighbour-Churches was he, whose eminency both for Place and Piety, is now worthily formost in guiding our owne; and whose blessed trauels in that seruice, as they were acceptable to God, his Maiesty, and that Nation; so are they a document to others, how powerfull and admirably successefull true Learning is, where it is guided with true Prudence, and where Piety and loue of Gods glory is linked with Charity, and zeale of mans good.

The Kings second religious proiect at the Conference.

(27) This great businesse and conference so royally accomplished, his Maiesties next care was (herein also as another Constantine) to perpetuate the maintenance of this flourishing Church (whose peaceable estate he had thus prouided for) with the reuenewes of her ancient foundations, as also to establish salutary lawes for the peaceable gouernment of his people; to which purpose, a Parliament was assembled at westminster, the 19. of March, wherein, for the Church it was enacted, that neither Archbishop nor Bishop should alienate, assure, giue, grant, demise, or in any sort conuay, no not to the King himselfe, his Heires, or Successors, any of the Honors, Castles, Manors, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, being parcell of the possessions of his Archbishopricke, or Bishopricke; and if any so were, to be vterly voide and of none effect, notwithstanding any former Law, Statute, Act, or Ordinance to the contrary.

The now Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, (D. George Abbot) the first preacher sent into Scotland.

A Parliament held March 19. The Church Lands not to be alienated.

Ex Parliament. Iacobi primi.

(28) Foure dayes before this Parliament commenced, it pleased his Maiesty, with the most Noble Queene Anne, and the most Illustrious Prince Henry, attended with glorious troupes of great Peeres, Prelates, and Courtiers, to ride in triumph through the City of London to Westminster, the Houses beautified with rich hangings, the streetes adorned with goodly Trophees and Pageants, of seuerall Nations inhabiting, the Rayles on both sides couered with blew Cloth, the seuerall Companies Honourably addressed, and ranked vnder the displayed Ensignes and Armes of their seuerall Trades and Sciences; the one shewing the wealth and state of the City; the other, the body of the Citizens and gouernement; and all making manifest the vnspeakeable ioy they conceiued to receiue their great Soueraigne into this His City, and Imperiall Chamber. In pledge of which their excessiue ioy, vnfained loue, and vowed fidelity, the Recorder at the Crosse in Cheape, both gratulated his Maiesty with a * pithy speech in the Name of the City, and wishing him a golden Raigne, presented his Greatnesse with a Cup

Cup of Gold; deliuering another likewiſe to the Queene, and a third to the Prince, which were all no leſſe graciouſly accepted, then moſt louingly preſented.

(29) Neither leſſe was his Maieſties deſire to retaliate the Citizens and other his Subiects true affections, when recounting the great hinderances of Merchandizing and Nauigations of trafficke, by reaſon of the long continued breach betwixt England and Spaine, his royall heart tendring his Subiects tranquility, endeauoured to ſalue againe thoſe wounds of diſcord with the * ſweet balme of Peace; which was ſolemnly proclaimed in London, Auguſt 19. the Sea being made open to Merchants for their free commerce.

Pſal. 141. 6.

The two Kingdomes vnited vnder the name of Great Britain.

(30) Both Domeſticke and forraine affaires thus plauſibly compoſed, as his Maieſty was the firſt, who in this laſt age of the World held the Scepter of the whole Iland in his royall hand, ſo to vnite the two ſtiles vnder the name of one entire Empire, and the two Nations into a ioynt bleſſed vnity; He cauſed himſelfe by Proclamation to be enſtiled, King of great Britaine, according to the ancient name of this Iſle before the Saxons Conqueſt; the reſtoring of which name againe, many fore-dooming ſpirits had anciently preſaged, as now we ſee effected. Vnto which Imperiall ſtile, are rightly annexed the Kingdomes of France and Ireland, rightfully belonging by birth and Conqueſt vnto the Crowne of England.

Ieſuites and Seminary Prieſts baniſhed.

(31) Two other Proclamations afterwards came forth; the one for the Baniſhment of all Ieſuites and Seminary Prieſts, out of the Land; and the other, to confirme the Eccleſiaſticall gouernment, and Booke of Common Prayer, in the ſame forme and eſtate, as Queene Elizabeth left them, to the no little griefe of the workers for Rome, whoſe deſignes began now to ſucke in ſuch poyſon, as in the venting whereof, not onely the Earth might haue trembled vnder the weight of ſuch Monſters, but euen the Heauens bee aſtonied and confounded, to giue thoſe Serpents the breath or benefit of Ayre. Vnto which bloudy, horrible, and odious act to God and man, my Stile muſt now turne: a matter indeed ſo diſtaſtiue for me to remember, or to write of, that it abhorres my very ſoule to fill the Pen with Inke, or to blot the Paper with theſe blacke ſpots of darkneſſe, and deformers of Englands faire face.

Ier. 2. 12. The treaſon cõceiued againſt the State.

The heatheniſh cruelty of the 1. unpowder Treaſon.

(32) The Plot was to vndermine the Parliament Houſe, and with Gunpowder to blow vp the King, the Prince, Clergy, Nobles, Knights, and Burgeſſes, the very confluence of all the flower of Glory, Pietty, Learning, Prudence, Authority in the Land, Fathers, Sonnes, Brothers, Allyes, Friends, Foes, Papiſts, and Proteſtants, all at one blaſt. A ſtratagem inuented by him that blowes the bellowes of deſtruction; faſhioned in the forge of the bottomleſſe pitte; put in practiſe in a vault of darkeneſſe; and forwarded by him that is the Father of darkneſſe; and in darkneſſe I could wiſh it might euer dwell: whoſe like was neuer reuealed to the light of the Sunne. Their intent, when that irreligious atchieuement had beene performed, was, to ſurprize the remainder of the Kings Iſſue; to alter Religion and the State, and to bring in forraine Power. Sir Edmund Baynam an attainted perſon (who ſtyled himſelfe Prince of the damned Crew) was ſent vnto the Pope, as hee was a temporall Prince, to acquaint him with the Gunpowder-Treaſon; a fit Poſte indeed to be imployed betwixt the Pope and the Diuell.

Baynam appointed the Poſt. Pag. 133.

(33) This Treaſon was firſt ſet on foot in the laſt yeere of the late Queenes Raigne, when Henry Garnet the Superiour of the Ieſuites, Catesby and others ſent Thomas Winter into Spaine to negociate with King Philip in the name of the Engliſh Catholikes; firſt, to ſend an Army vnto them, who now were in a readineſſe to ioyne their Forces with his: ſecondly, to grant ſome Penſions vnto ſundry perſons deuoted to his ſeruice in England: and thirdly, to giue aduertiſement of the diſcontents that the young Gentlemen and Souldiers had conceiued vpon the death of Eſſex, whereby a moſt fit occaſion was then offered to forward the common cauſe. To proſecute which buſineſſe, hee made for his meanes Father Creſwell the Leiger Ieſuite in Spaine, Don Petro Franceſa ſecond Secretary to the State, and the Duke of Lerma a great Counſellor to the King; all of them aſſuring this ill commiſſioned Ambaſſador, that the Office of his imployment would bee very gratefull to their Maſter.

Winter ſent into Spaine.

(34) The place for landing concluded vpon by theſe wiſe Statiſts, was Kent or Eſſex, if the Kings Army were great; if otherwiſe, then Milford Hauen in Wales was held fitteſt: with theſe and other like complots, Winter all that Summer followed the King in his Progreſſe, and laſtly had anſwer by the Count Miranda, that his King would beſtow a hundred thouſand Crownes towards the expedition, halfe hereof to be paid that preſent yeere, and the reſt in the next Spring, when (at the fartheſt) he meant to ſet foot in England; on whoſe behalfe hee willed the Engliſh Catholikes to maintaine their promiſe, whom hee reſpected (as was auowed) as his owne proper Caſtilians: And further defired their continuall aduertiſements, if in the meane time it chanced the old Queene to die.

The plots determined for the Inuaſion of England.

King Philips anſwer and offer.

(35) Winter thus laden with hopes, returneth from Spain, and emptieth his male into the boſomes of Garnet, Catesby, and Treſham, and they vnto others, all of them tickled to heare the newes, reſted fully ſatisfied, expecting the day. But before the Spring-time was fully approached, that Morning Starre, and Mirror of her Sexe, did ſet in our Weſt, the thrice-glorious Elizabeth, who had now iudged Iſrael full forty foure yeeres in admirable tranquility, as in her Raigne we haue ſufficiently ſeene. To ſignifie whoſe death, Chriſtopher Wright was from Catesby and others ſent into Spaine, and Guy Fawkes likewiſe was poſted thither from Bruxels, by Sir William Stanley, both of them to proſecute the former negotiation, aſſuring the Spaniſh King, that King Iames meant to runne the ſame courſe, and to proceede as rigorouſly againſt the Catholikes, as the late Queene had done: for whoſe defence they inſtantly deſired that ſome Spaniards might bee tranſported vnto Milford Hauen, where the Romiſh-minded would bee forward to aſſiſt them, hauing in a readineſſe two thouſand horſe furniſhed for the enterpriſe. But King Philip aſwell poizing his honour, as his zeale for Religion, and obſeruing a great difference betwixt States in hoſtility, and of Kings raigning in friendſhip, in no wiſe would liſten to inuade England, or further to proceed in any forcible enterpriſe.

The hopes of the Engliſh Catholikes.

Proceedings againſt Traytors, pag. 72.

King Philip refuſeth all hoſtile attempts againſt England.

(36) In the meane while the Ieſuites had been tampering to diſſwade the acceptance of King Iames into England, vrging it for a Maxime, that death was to bee endured, rather then to admit an heretike (ſo it pleaſed them to tearme the Lords annointed) and thoſe that gaue him conſent they held lyable to Excommunication by the cenſure of Pope Clement the eight, who had liberally beſtowed vpon his ſacred Perſon, the names of a Puritan, an Heretike, a Caluiniſt, a perſecutor of Proteſtants, and another Iulian Apoſtata.

(37) The Romaniſts thus looſened from their Ankor-hold of Spaine, and left by that Pylote to ſhift for themſelues, now perceiued their owne error in their long expectation, That change of State, would change Religion: but ſhee now gone, whoſe life they had often laid for, and her godly Succeſſour no whit inferior to her for aduancing the Goſpell: their hopes grew deſperate (as theſe deſperates alleaged) and no other meanes now left them but onely to kill the King, whom they falſly calumniated to haue broken his promiſe for a tolleration in Religion, as Watſon and Percy had diuulged among them; yea, and a fraudulent meſſage was ſent to the Pope

The deſperate attempts of the Papiſts.

King Iames ſcandalized by the Papiſts.

Pope by the Scotiſh Secretary, that K. Iames would become his obedient ſonne. But how farre his religious heart was from theſe aſperſions, appeared both by Watſon himſelfe, who, condemned to die, tooke it vpon the ſaluation of his ſoule, that hee could not draw the ſmalleſt comfort from the King for a toleration of the Catholikes, but that himſelfe had imparted his words in a milder tune then his Maieſty meant them, onely to keepe (as hee excuſed the matter) the Catholikes in loue and duty vnto the King: and ſince by the Lord of Balmerinoth (Secretary to the King in Scotland) who acknowledging his offence, hath beene arraigned and found guilty of death, for deuiſing letters, and ſending them to Rome, which himſelfe cunningly got ſigned in ſhufling them amongſt others, his Maieſty being vtterly ignorant of the Contents.

(38) Vpon which falſe ſuggeſtions, the Athieſticall poſition of Catesby was grounded, who held it for an Axiome, as Father Parſons had taught: That the whole Schoole both of Diuines and Lawyers make it a poſition certaine, and to be vndoubtedly beleeued, That if any Chriſtian Prince whatſoeuer, ſhall manifeſtly turne from the Catholike Religion, and deſire or ſeeke to reclaime other men from the ſame, he preſently falleth from all Princely power and dignity, and that alſo by vertue and power of the Law it ſelfe both diuine and humane, euen before any ſentence pronounced againſt him by the ſupreme Paſtor and Iudge. And that his Subiects of what eſtate or condition ſoeuer, are freed from all bond of Oath of Alleagiance, which at any time they had made vnto him as to their lawfull Prince. Nay, that they both may and ought (prouided they haue competent ſtrength and force) caſt out ſuch a man from bearing rule among Chriſtians, as an Apoſtata, an Heretike, a Backe-ſlider, and Reuolter from our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, and an enemy to his own State and Common-wealth, leſt perhaps hee might infect others, or by his example or command, turne them from the faith. Yea, one ſtep further elſewhere is ſtood vpon, that if any Prince ſhall but fauour or ſhew countenance to an Hereticke, he preſently looſeth his Kingdome. And thus they conclude, that for Hereſie a Prince is to bee depoſed, and his Kingdome to bee beſtowed at the pleaſure of the Pope, for whom the people vpon paine of damnation are to take part and fight: out of which deteſtable concluſions, aroſe the firſt ſmoake of the Gunpowder Treaſon.

(39) For the Parliament diſſolued the ſeuenth of Iuly, and prorogued vntill the ſeuenth of February following, Catesby being at Lambeth, ſent for Thomas Winter, who before had beene imployed into Spaine, and brake with him then for blowing vp of the Parliament Houſe: who readily apprehending it, ſaid, that (indeede) ſtrake at the roote: only theſe helpes were wanting, a Houſe for reſidence, and a man of skill to carry the Mine: but the firſt, Catesby aſſured him was eaſily to bee got, and for the man hee commended Guy Fawkes, a ſufficient Souldier, and a moſt forward Catholike. But firſt (quoth hee) becauſe no peaceable way ſhall bee vntred, you ſhall ouer to the Conſtable, and intreate him to ſollicite his Maieſty at his comming into England, that the penall Lawes may here bee repealed, and the Catholikes tolerated and ranked with his other Subiects.

(40) Winter thus poſted to negotiate with the Conſtable, found him at Bergen neere Dunkirke, and by the meanes of Owen the fugitiue Traytor, deliuered his meſſage; whoſe anſwere was, that hee had a ſtrict command from his Maſter to doe all good Offices for the Catholikes, and for his owne part he found himſelfe bound in conſcience not to omit any good occaſion that might forward their cauſe: although indeed hee did but temporize, as Sir William Stanley told Winter, for the great deſire which the Spaniards had that the Peace might proceed with England. Whereupon Winter (hopeleſſe that way) returned for England, bringing with him the fore-ſaid Fawkes, a fit inſtrument for ſo diueliſh a deſigne; and comming to Lambeth, told Catesby that the Conſtable was not the man whatſoeuer were his words, and that all now in thoſe parts were bent for a concluſion of Peace; which ſounded ſo harſhly in his ill-tuned eares, that his braines became more buſied about his impious Proiect, and his mind in continuall trauell to bring forth that ſinne, which he had moſt vnnaturally conceiued.

(41) Robert Catesby, Iohn Wright, Thomas Winter, and Guy Fawkes holding a community in their miſchiefes ſtill about London; about the middeſt of Eaſter-Terme, Thomas Percy as hote as the Hotſpur himſelfe to forward Rebellion, came puffing to Catesbies lodging in Lambeth, and the firſt word hee ſpake, was this: what Gentlemen, ſhall wee alwayes be talking, and neuer doe any thing? you perceiue (I know) how things doe proceede. To whom Catesby anſwered, that ſomething was reſolued vpon, but firſt an Oath for ſecreſie was to bee miniſtred. For which purpoſe they appointed to meete ſome three dayes after behind Saint Clements Church without Temple-Barre, where being met, and falling in Conference, Catesby alleaged that this laſt Parliament had left the Catholikes in as much danger as they ſtood before, and that now the peace with Spaine was rather a meane for harder Lawes to proceed, then thoſe in force againſt them to be abrogated; ſo that the ancient Romiſh Religion, and the Catholike profeſſors thereof, muſt now be enforced to bid England adue, if Gentlemen of power and repute ſhould thus giue way to the contrary proceedings, or thus make nice how to helpe, or where to beginne: At which ſpeech Percy made preſent anſwer, Himſelfe was the man that would vndergoe the Catholike cauſe, were it with the ſlaughter of the King, which hee was there ready to vndertake and doe.

Percies reſolute and diueliſh anſwere.

(42) No, Tom (ſaid Catesby) thou ſhalt not aduenture thy ſelfe to ſo ſmall purpoſe, if thou wilt bee a Traytor, there is a Plot to greater aduantage, and ſuch a one as can neuer be diſcouered: and thereupon all of them taking the Oath of ſecreſie, hearing the Maſſe, and receiuing the Sacrament, Catesby tolde them his diueliſh deuice, which was by Mine and Gunpowder to blow vp the Parliament Houſe, and at one ſtroke with the deſtruction of many, effect that at once, which had been many yeeres in attempting. A matter eaſily performed (as hee vrged) if men of reſolution would thereunto beſtow their purſe and their paines; and moſt ſure from ſuſpition of diſcouery, the deſigne being ſo eſtranged from the conceit of man: wherein he alſo obſerued that religious Iuſtice was thirſty of reuenge, euen vpon the ſame perſons, and in the ſame place, whence ſhee firſt receiued the vniuſt Lawes enacted againſt her. For caſe of conſcience to kill the Innocent, with the nocent; he told them it was warrantable by the authority of Garnet himſelfe, the Superiour of the Engliſh Ieſuites, and of Gerrard, and Teſmond (Ieſuiticall Prieſts likewiſe) who by their Apoſtolicall Power did abſolue and commend the fact, which for the aduantage of the Catholikes was to be executed (they ſaid) though with the death of ſome Innocents, rather then the ſeruice ſhould quaile, the neceſſity of time and occaſion ſo requiring it. The Oath was giuen them by the ſaid Gerrard (the Diuels Atturney in this buſineſſe) the forme whereof was as followeth.

(43) The proiect thus farre paſſed, the practiſe was to proceed; and the firſt thing ſought after was for a houſe wherein they might begin their worke, to which purpoſe, no place was held fitter then a certaine edifice adioyning to the wall of the Parliament House, which serued for with-drawing roomes for the Assembled Lords; and out of Parliament was at the dispose of the Keeper of the place and Wardrobe thereunto belonging. These did Percy hier for his lodgings, entertaining Fawkes (as most vnknowen by face) for his man, who changing his name into Iohnson, had the Keyes and keeping of the roomes. Neither was this enough, but a house must be also had to supply Percies lodgings for prouision of Powder, and to frame and fit wood for the carriage of the Mine, which Catesby prouided at Lambeth, and swate Robert Keyes into their Conspiracies, making him the Keeper of those his prouisions, who in the night as occasion serued, conueyed the same vnto the custody of Fawkes.

Fawkes changed his name into Iohnson.

(44) The appointed day for the Parliament being the 7. of February; in October before, it was thought fit to beginne the worke, whereupon Fawkes returning forth of the Countrey, found Percies roomes appointed for the Scotish Lords to meet in, there to conferre touching the Vnion of the two Kingdomes: so that they feared (for that present) to iniate their attempt. But that honourable Assembly dissolued, vpon the eleuenth of December late in the night, they entred into their worke of Darkenesse, and begun their Mine; hauing tooles prepared, and baked meates prouided, the better to auoid suspition by sending abroad.

(45) The Moles that first vnderwent these vndermings, were Robert Catesby Esquire, the mouing Arch-Traytor, and ruine of his name, Thomas Percy Esquire, kinsman and attendant vpon the Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Winter, Iohn Wright, and Guy Fawkes, Gentlemen, and Thomas Bates, Catesbies man, all of them grounded Schollers of the Romish Schoole, and such earnest labourers in this their Vault of Villany, that by Christmas Eue (which very day might haue remembred them of more Christian workes) they had brought the worke vnder an entry, vnto the wall of the Parliament House, vnderpropping still as they went the earth with their framed Timber, nor till that day were they seene abroad of any man.

(46) During this vndermining, much consultation was had how to fashion the rest of the businesse, after the deed should be accomplished, and many questions propounded and argued at full, before they could pitch on a setled resolution. The first was how to surprize the next heire to the Crowne; for though they doubted not, but Prince Henry would accompany his Father, and take his lot with him, yet they feared lest D. Charles (being absent, as too yong to attend at Parliament) would escape their train, and perchance be so carefully guarded, and attended vpon at Court, that hee would hardly bee gotten into their hands. Of which first rub in their way, Percy offered himselfe to be the first remouer, and shewed his meanes, which was, that with some other Gentlemen, hee would enter the Dukes Chamber, which by reason of his acquaintance hee very well might doe without any suspition: and others of his like acquaintance should bee placed at seuerall dores in the Court: so that when the blow was giuen, and all men in a maze, then would he carry away the Duke, which hee presumed would be easily done, the most of the Court being then absent, and they present altogether vnprouided for to make resistance.

Duke Charles intended to be surprized.

(47) For the surprize of the Lady Elizabeth, it was held a matter of farre lesse difficulty, shee remaining at the Lord Haringtons, and Abby (Catesbies House) neer vnto her, whether vnder a shew of Hunting, diuers Catholikes should bee gathered, who hauing the aduantage in knowing for what purpose they were assembled, had the full liberty of that distracted time, to prouide money, horses, armour, and other abiliments of war, vnder pretence of strength to guard and secure the Heire apparant.

The Lady Elizabeth intended to be taken from the Lord Harrington.

(48) Then it was discussed, what Lords they should saue from the Parliament; where it was agreed, that they should keepe thence as many as they could that were Catholikes, or that way fauouring: all others to feele the smart, and the imputation of the Treason to be cast vpon the Puritanes, to make them more odious to the World.

(49) Next it was controuersed what forraine Princes shold be made priuy to these their purposes; for to enioyne them to secresie, or to obliege them by oath, was not in their power: and to assay their likes or dislikes, would proue dangerous. For if any of them approued the designe, their preparation might beget suspition: if not, then the feares of discouery would extinguish the enterprize, no man daring to proceed further therein. Spaine was held the fittest to second their attempts, but he was too slow in his preparations, and France too neere, and too dangerous to be dealt with; and how Holland stood affected to England they all very well knew. But in the midst of these turmoiles and minings vnderground, the Parliament was againe adiourned till the fift of October ensuing. Vpon which Proclamation they brake off both discourse and worke till the Feast of Saint Maries Purification. At which time they laide in powder and other prouisions, and then began againe to worke, hauing taken into their company Christopher Wright and Robert Winter, both of them swome, and receiuing the Sacrament for secresie. The wall (which was very hard, and nine foot thicke) with great labour they wrought halfe through, Fawkes being their Centinell to giue warning when any came neere, that the noyse in digging might not be heard.

The Parliament againe prorogued.

Robert Winter, Christopher Wright taken into consort.

The worke again begun.

(50) The labourers thus working into the wall, were suddenly surprized with a great feare, and casting from them their digging Tooles, tooke to their weapons, hauing sufficient of shot and powder in the house, being fully resolued, rather to die in the place, then to yeeld or be taken. The cause of their feare, was a noyse they heard in a roome vnder the Parliament House, vnder which they meant to haue mined, directly vnder the Chaire of Estate. But all now at a stand, and their countenance cast each vpon other, as doubtfull what would be the issue of this their enterprize: Fawkes scowted forth to descry (if he could) what was done abroad, and finding all safe and free from suspect, returned, and told them, the noyse was onely a remouall of coales there now vpon sale, and that the Cellar was to bee let, which would bee more commodious to their purpose, and would also spare the labour in the Mine. Whereupon Thomas Percy vnder pretence for stowage of his winter prouision of wood and coales, went and hired the Cellar, which done, a new conference was had.

The feare of the Traytors.

(51) Wherein Catesby found the weight of the whole too heauy for himselfe alone to support; for besides the maintenance of so many persons, and the seuerall houses for seuerall vses, hired and paide for by him, the Gunpowder and other prouisions would rise to a very great summe, and indeed too much for one mans purse. Therefore he desired that himselfe, Percy, and some one more might call in such others as they thought fit to helpe to maintaine the charge, alleaging that they knew men of worth and wealth, that would willingly assist, but were not willing their names should be knowen to the rest. This his request they approued as necessary, and withall surceasing further to digge in the Vault, knowing the Cellar would be of better vse for their designes, they remoued twenty Barrels of Gunpowder into that roome, which they couered with a thousand of Billets, and fiue hundred of Faggots, so that now the lodging roomes were cleered of all suspitious prouisions, and freely might be entred without danger of descry.

(52) But the Parliament being againe prorogued vntill the fifth of November following, these foresaid vnderminers of our State and happinesse, thought fit they should againe (for a while) disperse themthemſelues (matters being already in ſo good forwardnes) and that Guy Fawkes ſhould go ouer to acquaint Sir William Stanley, and Maſter Hugh Owen with theſe their proceedings, yet ſo as the oath of ſecreſie ſhould be taken of them. For their policy was to haue Sir William Stanleys preſence ſo ſoone as the diſmall blow ſhould be giuen, to be a leader to their intended ſtratagems, whereof (as they thought) they ſhould haue great need, and that Owen ſhould remaine where he was, to hold correſpondency with forraine Princes, to allay (aſmuch as hee might) the odiouſnes of the fact, or to impute the Treaſon to the Puritanes diſcontents.

(53) Fawkes comming into Flanders found Owen, vnto whom, after the oath, hee declared the plotte, which hee very well approued. But Sir William Stanley (at that time in Spaine) Owen ſaid would be hardly drawne into the buſineſſe, for that hee had ſuits in the Engliſh Court himſelfe, yet hee promiſed to forward him in all that hee could, and to ſend him into England with the firſt, when their proiect had taken effect. Whereupon Fawkes to auoid further ſuſpition, kept ſtill in Flanders vntill the beginning of September, and then returning, receiued the keys of the Cellar, and laid in more powder, billets and fagots; which done, hee retired into the Countrey and there kept till the end of October.

(54) In the meane while Catesby and Percy meeting at the Bathe, it was there concluded, becauſe their number were but few, that Catesby himſelfe ſhould haue power to call in whom hee would to aide their deſigne: by which authority he tooke in Sir Euerard Digby of Rutlandſhiere knight, and Francis Treſham of Northamptonſhire Eſquier, both of them of ſufficient eſtate and wealth, had they not abuſed both to their owne deſtruction: for Sir Euerard offered fifteene hundred pounds to forward the action, and Treſham two thouſand. But Percy diſdaining that any ſhould outrun him in euill, promiſed foure thouſand pounds out of the Earle of Northumberlands rents, and tenne horſes of ſpeed to ſteed them when the blow was paſt. Againſt which time to prouide munition, Catesby likewiſe tooke in Ambroſe Rookewood and Iohn Grant two Recuſant Gentlemen, and vndoubtedly others were written in the ſame Roll, had theſe two grand Electors beene apprehended aliue, whoſe owne tongues only could vnfold their Catalogues Record.

(55) The buſineſſe thus forwarded by their complices abroad, their Inmates did not neglect theſe pplies at home. For Percy, Winter, and Fawkes had ſtored the Cellar with thirty ſixe Barrels of Gunpowder, and vpon them beſtowed (in ſteed of ſhot) Barres of Iron, logges of timber, maſſie ſtones, Iron Crowes, Picke-axes, and all their working tooles, and (to couer all) great ſtore of Billets and fagots, ſo that nothing was wanting but all in a readineſſe, attending that great and terrible day. Neither were the Ieſuiticall Prieſts ſlacke on their parts, who vſually concluded their Maſſes and oblatory Sacrifices, with their prayers for the good ſucces of their expected hopes, as by the ſe verſes, made and vſed by Garnet is to be ſeene.

Vt Chriſto laudes debitas perſoluamus alacriter.

And others thus, Proſper Lord their paines that labour in thy cauſe day and night, let Hereſie vaniſh away like ſmoake, let their memory periſh with a cracke, like the ruine and fall of a broken houſe: Alluſions doubtleſſe to the labours in the Vault, the mounting ſmoake of powder, and the fall of the Parliament Houſe, which if it had happened, they might haue ſaid to haue beene Prophetically fore-told by their high Prieſts for that yeere.

(56) But the Lord that neuer ſlipt the deliuerance of his elect, kept this his Iſrael as the Apple of his owne eye, and this pit digged for the deſtruction of others, they fell into themſelues: ſo that wee may well ſay, If the Lord had not been on our ſides when men roſe vp againſt vs, they had ſwallowed vs vp quicke, when their wrath was kindled againſt vs; but praiſed be the Lord which hath not giuen vs a prey vnto their teeth: our ſoule is eſcaped euen as a Bird out of the ſnare of the Fowler, the ſnare is broken, and we are deliuered. For this Cockatrice egge hatched by themſelues, proued a Serpent onely to themſelues, and themſelues (by Gods hand) made the onely Inſtruments to breake the ſhell of their owne Treaſon. Pſal. 124.

(57) For vpon Thurſday in the euening, ten dayes before the intended Parliament, a Letter directed to the Lord Monteagle, was deliuered by an vnknowen perſon vnto his footman in the ſtreet, with a ſtraight charge giuen, to giue it into his Lords owne hand, which accordingly he did. The Letter was without date and ſubſcription, and ſomewhat vnlegible, ſo as the Nobleman called for one of his ſeruants to aſſiſt him therein, the ſtrange contents whereof much perplexed the true conſtruction, as whether writ by ſome Paſquill to ſcarre him from attendance, or as matter of conſequence from aduiſe of ſome friend. Howſoeuer, though it were Supper time, and the night as darke as the purport of the Letter; yet to diſcharge his loyall duty, he forth-with repayred to the Kings Palace at White-Hall, where hee imparted the Letter to the Earle of Salisbury, Principall Secretary, and they both preſently acquainted the Lord Chamberlaine therewith, who deemed the matter not a little to concerne himſelfe, the charge of his Office being to ouer-ſee all places whether his Maieſty was to repaire; theſe two Counſellors ſhewed the ſame Letter to the Earles of Worceſter & Northampton, who together concluded (how ſleight ſoeuer the contents ſeemed to appeare, as proceeding from ſome ſurmiſes of an idle and light braine) to acquaint the King himſelfe with the ſame, which accordingly was done, and was as followeth.

The Letter ſent to the Lord Monteagle.

My Lord, out of the loue I beare to ſome of your friends, I haue a care of your preſeruation. Therefore I would aduiſe you, as you tender your life, to deuiſe ſome exteuſe to ſhift off your attendance at this Parliament. For God and man haue concurred to puniſh the wickedneſſe of this time. And thinke not ſleightly of this aduertiſement, but retire your ſelfe into your Countrey, where you may expect the euent in ſafety. For though there be no appearance of any ſtirre, yet I ſay, they ſhall receiue a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they ſhall not ſee who hurts them. This counſell is not to be contemned, becauſe it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme; for the danger is paſt ſo ſoone as you haue burnt the Letter. And I hope God will giue you the grace to make good vſe of it: to whoſe holy protection I commend you.

(58) His Maieſty a while pauſing, and then re-reading the letter, deliuered his iudgement, that the ſtile thereof was too quicke and pithy to bee a libel bred from the ſuperfluities of an idle braine, and on the inſtant did apprehend by theſe words; that they ſhould receiue a terrible blow at this Parliament, and yet ſhould not ſee who hurt them; that a ſudden danger by blaſt of Gunpowder ſhould be intended by ſome baſe villaine in a corner, no inſurrection, rebellion, or deſperate attempt appearing. And therefore wiſhed that the vnder roomes of the Parliament Houſe might be throughly ſearched, before himſelfe, or Peeres ſhould ſit therein. To which purpoſe it was then concluded, that the Lord Chamberlaine ſhould (according to his Office & place) view all the rooms aboue and below: but as well to ſtay idle rumors, as to let things ripen to reueale their own myſteries, this his ſearch ſhould be deferred vntill Munday, the day immediately before the Parliament, and then to be with a ſeeming ſleight eye, to auoid ſuſpect.

(59) The Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine, according to the concluſion, vpon Munday in the afternoone (being accompanied with the L. Monteagle, who ſtill thirſted to ſee the iſſue) repaired vnto thoſe vnder-roomes, and finding the Sellar ſo ſuffi- Nouemb. 4.

ciently ſtored with wood and coales, demanded of Fawkes (the counterfeit Iohnſon, who ſtood there attending as a ſeruant of ſmall repute) who owed the place: his anſwere was, that the lodgings belonged to Maſter Thomas Percy, and the Sellar likewiſe, to lay in his winter prouiſion, himſelfe being the Keeper and Maſter Pereies ſeruant. Whereunto the Earle as void of any other ſuſpition, preſently replied, that his Maſter was well prouided againſt Winters blaſts: but being come forth, the Lord Montegle told him, that hee did much ſuſpect Percy to bee the inditer of the letter, knowing his affection in religion, and the friendſhip betwixt them profeſſed, ſo as his heart gaue him (hee ſaid) when hee heard Percy named, that his hand was in the act.

(60) The Lord Chamberlaine returning, related to the King in preſence of ſome Counſellors, what hee had ſeene: and the ſuſpition that the Lord Montegle had of Percy, and himſelfe of Iohnſon his man; which preſently increaſed his Maieſties apprehenſion and iealouſie, whereupon hee inſiſted, that a narrow ſearch ſhould be made, and thoſe billets and coales ſhould be turned to the bottome, which as he confidently ſuppoſed was the couering of ſome notable intended treaſon. But ſome moued the doubt how this ſearch ſhould be made: for albeit no caution could be too much in ſo great a danger, yet the inducement thereunto, being no more then a nameleſſe inſcript, ſhufled no man knew whence, and might well be the euaporation of an idle brain, wold ſeeme (if nothing were found) ſome ſcandall vnto the State, to bee ouer ſuſpicious of ſo friuolous a toy, & withall might leaue ſome ſad imputation on a great counſellor of the land. Notwithſtanding, his Maieſty ſtill perſiſting in his former opinion, willed that the ſearch ſhould be throughly made, and no poſſibility of danger left vnexamined, vnleſſe they meant to goe to the Parliament, and leaue the hazard to the euent, which hee thought they in conſcience were loth to doe. Whereupon it was concluded, that the ſearch ſhould be made; but vnder color of ſearching for certaine hangings belonging to the houſe which were miſſing, and conuaied away.

(61) Sir Thomas Kneuet, (now Lord Kneuet, then a Gentleman of his Maieſties Priuy Chamber) was imployed herein, and about midnight (before the very morning when the Parliament was to beginne) went vnto the place with a ſmall but well affected company. At the dore of entrance into the Cellar, finding one (which was Guy Fawkes) at ſo vnſeaſonable a time, cloaked and booted, hee thought fitte to apprehend him, and entring the place, ouerturned the billets and coales, when preſently hee found the Serpents neſt, ſtored with thirty ſixe barrels (ſmall and great) of gunpowder, then ſearching the villaine that ſhould haue hatched theſe egges, found about him a darke lanterne, three matches and other inſtruments for blowing vp the powder: who no whit daunted, inſtantly confeſſed his guiltines, and was ſo farre from contrition or repentance, as hee vowed, that had hee been found within the houſe (as indeed he was then but immediately come foorth from his worke) hee certainely would haue blowne vp the houſe with himſelfe, and them all: and was ſo obdurate in his Romiſh reſolution, that being brought before the Lords of the Councell, hee lamented nothing ſo much, as that the deed had not been done, ſaying, that the Diuell and not God was the diſcouerer of the plot.

(62) As deſperate were Catesby, Percy, and the reſt, who hauing notice that the Lord Montegles letter giue ſome ouerture of ſuſpition, yet would they ſtay to ſee the ſucceſſe, and forſooke not London vntill the ſame day wherein the deed ſhould haue beene done: Catesby, Percy, Rookewood, both the Wrights, and Thomas Winter, poſted all into Warwickſhiere, where Grant and his aſſociates had taken certaine great horſes out of a ſtable, to forward their hoped great day. Theſe meeting at Dunchurch, where Sir Enerard Digby had made a match for a ſet hunting, not with hounds for the hare (which was only the colour,) but with Nimrod for bloud, and ſurprize of the moſt vertuous young Princeſſe Lady Elizabeth, were told (by the eſcaped) of their certaine diſcouery, and preſent purſuit; when ſtrucke with terrour, not knowing where to make ſtay, or whither to ſtir, they deſperately beganne an open rebellion, pretending the cauſe was Religion, and affirming for truth, that all the Catholikes throates were appointed to bee cut. And ſo trouping together, wandred through Warwickſhire, the edges of Worceſter, and borders of Stafford ſhieres, their ſeruants and aiders beeing about foureſcore men, and thoſe euer ready to ſteale away from them, more care was in keeping, then truſt repoſed either in their faith or defence. Yet thus ranging, and finding no reſiſtance, they rifled the Lord Windſors houſe of all the Armour, ſhot, powder, and other warlike prouiſions, but the weather rainy, and the waters ſomewhat high, the powder in carriage tooke wet, and thereby became vnſeruiceable. God in his iuſtice ſo ordering the ſucceſſes, that the element of water, and accident of fire, fought againſt them, as the ſtars in their courſes did againſt Siſera. Iudge. 5. 20.

(63) For their laſt fort of refuge; being Holbach in Staffordſhiere (the houſe of Stephen Littleton,) whither Sir Richard walſh (high Shiriffe of Worceſterſhire) purſued them, who thinking the ſtirre no greater (though ſo great enough) then ſom fray or riot, ſent his Trumpet vnto them, commanding to render themſelues vnto him his Maieſties Miniſter, with promiſe of his beſt meanes (if they ſo did) to allay the offence. But their owne conſciences witneſſing what the Sheriffe knew not, told them the fault was too waighty to leaue them any hope of fauour: and thereupon returned anſwere, that hee had neede of greater aſſiſtance then of thoſe few numbers that were with him: before hee could be able to command or controll them. So preparing for reſiſtance, they made ready their weapons, and hauing laid two pound of the ſaid powder in a platter to drie in the chimney, one (a Millar) comming to amend the fire, threw in a billet, wherewith a ſparke flying out, chanced to fall on the powder, whoſe ſuddaine blaſt was ſo violent, that (though being of ſo ſmall a quantity) it blew vp the roofe of the houſe, and ſcortched the bodies and faces of Catesby, Rookewood and Grant, with ſome others, whoſe conſciences then ſtrucken with the guilt of their ſinne, made them ſee Gods ſearching iuſtice in puniſhing like with like. Thus being deiected with the accident, and now knowing that all was loſt, like deſperate men, they there reſolued to die together, ſet open the gate, ſuffered the Sheriffes followers to ruſh in among them, and by valour (as they tearmed it) fought for their owne deſtruction; for both the Wrights were therein ſhot downe dead, Ambroſe Rookewood, and Thomas Winter were very ſore wounded; and laſtly Catesby and Percy reſolutly fighting, backe to backe, were both of them ſlaine with one bullet of musket-ſhot.

Fire-working Traitors puniſhed by fire.

(64) Thus theſe high aſpiring ſpirits, deceiued with the ſpirit of illuſion, vnder opinion of religion, and dreaming of no leſſe then deſtruction of King, Princes and people, with alterations of kingdomes, Church and State, were miſerably defeated, not by humane prouidence, but diuine mercy. Some preſently ſlaine in heate of Rebellion, others deadly wounded, were taken aliue, the reſt either whole or but lightly hurt, were led priſoners to London, and to other places, all the way gazed at, reuiled and deteſted by the common people, as ſome ſtrange Monſters of the world, for this their helliſh and horriole Treaſon; and laſtly condemned & executed as they moſt worthily deſerued; whoſe inditements, arraignments and confeſſions, I refer to be read in the true Relations already printed thereof, with ſundry other weighty matters thereto incident, in that learned diſcourſe, written by the moſt honourable Lord

Henry

Henry Howard, Earle of Northampton, Lord Priuy Seale.

An.D.1605. (65) In memory of which great deliuerance, the fifth of Nouember (the day appointed for merciless destruction) was by authority of the same Parliament enacted to bee for euer celebrated with thanksgiuing, praise and prayers vnto our heauenly Preseruer, & to be kept holy vnto the Lord through our generations, which we wish may bee obserued, with no lesse acknowledgement of Gods infinite mercies to vs-ward, then was among the Iewes, the institution of their Purim, for their deliuerance from the practise of wicked Haman, that so our Temples being thus freed from their prophane Idolatry, wee may euer make this day as the feast of our dedication, like to the Maccabees, who in the same moneth did institute theirs, by cleansing Gods Temple of heathenish pollutions. So shall Christ with his spirituall approch, beautifie this Church of ours, as with his humane presence in the Temple at Ierusalem he celebrated that Winters feast of theirs: wherein hee taught that himselfe was the true son of God, and the only dore by which all must enter. Through which therefore let vs with Ieremy, approch his Altar, to make supplications for the Kings peace: and with Baruch to pray for the Kings life, and life of his sonne, that their daies may be vpon the earth as the dayes of heauen, their branches as the beauteous Oliue, and their roots fastned as the cedars of Lebanon.

For my part, I haue here onely pointed at His Maiesties first entrance and acts, rather to shew a liberty of writing the Kingdomes affaires, which neuer is permitted, sauing vnder good Princes, then by my vnable performance to enter into that which requires the pen of some iudicious Tacitus, or eloquent Zenophon, and conclude with the aduise of Amianus Marcellinus, the famous Historian: Let our men for experience more sufficient, and for learning better known, write the rest, whom, if it shall please them to enter thereupon, I aduise to frame their pennes vnto an higher Stile.

The Circumferences of these ancient Monies, being diuers and different, we haue in this Sculpture obserued, by shewing three Diameters, whose Circles import the bigneſſe of their Mintage, and their figures compared with these, direct their proportions to be of the same, as thou seest.

A ſummary Concluſion of the whole.

BY the aſſiſtance of the All-Sufficient (the onely defence and Preſeruer of man) my inſufficient abilities, haue attained the end of this worke, and my weake vnable Perſon brought to a Period this large Edifice of GREAT BRITAINS THEATRE. How acceptable to others, I know not; but with what paines and trauile to my ſelfe, my decaied ſtrength too manifeſtly haue felt, & with what care of truth, the Authorities alleaged through the whole Proceſſe, are my witneſſes; whoſe lines haue been the meaſures, and Antiquities the matter, that hath raiſed the Fabrick vnto this height. The attempt was great, and farre vnfit (I muſt confeſſe) for me to vndergoe; which, euen at the firſt entrance was ſo cenſured by the Iudicious, and in the continuance hath ſo proued: that now it being finiſhed, as the Silke-worme endeth her life in her long wrought clew, ſo I in this Theatre haue built my own Graue; whoſe Architecture howſoeuer defectiue it may be ſaid to be, yet the proiect is good: and the coſt great though my ſelfe haue freely beſtowed this paines to the Preſſe, without preſſing a penny from any mans purſe. For me to ſhew the vtility of Hiſtory, were to light a dimme candle before the bright Sunne; or to preſcribe a methode for their vſes, were, with Phormio to reade a Lecture of Chiualry vnto great Hannibal, warres experienced Conquerour: But, as our owne concerneth vs neereſt (wherein my pen hath taken the freeſt acceſſe) ſo let me abridge the whole in a ſmall Circle and incompaſſe that briefly, which hath beene related in a far wider circumference.

(2) Our Land, peopled from Iaphet the firſt ſonne of Noah, fell vnto thoſe ſonnes of Gomer and Iauan (the firſt and fourth ſonnes of Iaphet) which inhabited theſe parts of Europe, whoſe Iſſue were moſt famouſly knowne by the name of Britaines. At firſt, naked, rude, and ignorant of the true God; yet no ſooner were frequented with the ciuill Romanes, but that they couered their Cut-painted bodies with Garments, and ſhortly imitated them euen in their moſt ciuilized actions; yea, ſcarcely was Chriſt taken downe from his Croſſe, but they became Chriſtians, (the greateſt glory of any Nation) and among them the Goſpell had her firſt progreſſe by eſtabliſhed authority. Their Gouernment was vnder Kings, and thoſe of as honourable a reſpect, as were any other in theſe Weſt-parts of the World, both in training their Subiects vnto due obedience, and miniſtring of Lawes for the maintainance of eſtate. Their warres domeſticke and forraine were ſo managed with Policy and valour, as in the one they valiantly defended themſelues againſt their aſſaults, and in the other ſteeded the Romanes in moſt of their Conqueſts: which coſt them laſtly their owne ſubuerſions, when their warriers and virgins were conſumed and tranſported into other parts, whilſt their natiue Land lay expoſed to the will of Inuaders.

(3) The glory-thirſting Romanes (from a crew of lawleſſe Shepheards, now lately become Lords of the World) were the firſt that ſet foot, with diſplaied Enſigne,

Their firſt Conquerors.

Enſigne, for the Conqueſt of Britaine, and the ſame firſt aſſaied by Iulius Cæſar from the Coaſts of Gallia. Which his attempt was ſo honourable in eſteeme of their Emperors, that Claudius (the 5. in ſucceſſiō) holding the Triumph but baſe, that attends vpon authority without action of Price, made choiſe of Britaine to adorne his triumphant Chariot, that this Iland (ſited, as was thought, in another World, and but part thereof ſhewed by Cæſar to the Romans) might adde remembrance of name to his forgetfull Perſon: and to that end, hauing made hither himſelfe, ſtamped his Conqueſt vpon his Coines thus, DE BRITANN: and vpon his aged knees crept vp the ſteps of the Capitoll, to giue thankes of victory vnto his gods on the day of his Triumph; which, though for a ſmall part of this Ilands ſubiection, was yet accompliſhed with more then ordinary magnificence, and the ſhewes greater then vſually had been ſeene, for the Conqueſts of farre larger and better knowne Kingdoms. And with as great a care was it kept, whilſt the Romans kept their owne greatnes. But when their high-mounted Pillar ouerſwayed her owne Baſe, and the farre-ſpread boughs were growne to weighty for the ſtemme, many hands at once graſped at the Emperiall Crown, and all of them together tare the Branches from the Body of that faire Tree. By whom alſo the faire & flouriſhing Cedars of Britain were ſhaken, and left naked both of fruite, and leafe. So that now the glory of the one declined, and the beauty of the other vtterly defaced, and neither of them able any longer to ſupport their owne ſtandings, gaue place vnto deſtiny that would now haue both downe; whereby the Iewell ſo much deſired, and which had been kept with ſuch care, was now laid at ſtake to them that could winne it, and Britain abandoned by the Romans, without further claime, after they had been Lords thereof the ſpace of fiue hundred yeeres.

(4) The next Actors vpon Britaines faire Stage, were the Saxons, a people of Germany, fierce, bold, and irreligious, as, for the moſt part, the reſt of Nations in thoſe daies were. Theſe infeſting with Piracies the Coaſts of Britaine & Gallia, grew both fearefull and famous in profeſſion of military ſeruices. In France they ſeized vpon the Country of * Baiocaſſes; in Germany by intruſion they vnſeated the Suenians; in Holland and Frieſland, they incroached vpon the Batauians, and Cimbrica Cherſoneſus (now a continent of Denmarke) they made the place of their aboad. From whence they often aſſailed the Coaſts of this Iland, euen whilſt the Romans held it for theirs, and were often put backe by Stilicho and others, whoſe praiſes the Poet Claudian chaunted aloud. But the Romans departed, and Britaine left bare of men, their land waſted by famine, tumultuous vprores, and by bandings of Great-ones who ſhould be greateſt; the Scots and Picts (ancient Enemies to their Peace) tooke the aduantage, and continually made bloody incurſions into their Land. And albeit a ſtone-wal was raiſed athwart the whole Continent, to impeach their inroades, yet that auailed little, their aſſaults were ſo great. Whereupon the Saxons were ſent for; and in their firſt ſeruice freed the Britaines from thoſe raging Picts; The Lands defence they then vndertooke, and the Inhabitants conſented to maintaine the charge; which whilſt it was in giuing was thankefully receiued, but once receiued was vngratefully forgot. And they (like the Rauens of Arabia, who ſo long as they are full, yeeld a pleaſant noiſe, but being empty make a horrible cry) emptied faſter then the Britaines could fill, and euer complained they had not enough, till laſtly by ſurprize they got all into their own clawes. Then diuided they among themſelues the beſt of the Land, and droue their receiuers into the worſt and waſte mountaines of Wales, euery of their Captaines ſharing a part to himſelfe, and of one Emperiall Crowne made ſeauen Diademes to adorne their owne heads; which long were not worne, without inteſtine warres, each of them ſtriuing to inlarge his owne, vpon his next, till God and deſtiny againe brought all vnto One, euen to great Egbert, who forbade the Ilands old Name, and commanded theſe now vnited Prouinces to be called Anglia. Yet no ſooner was this accompliſhed, with aſſured hopes conceiued, that the Saxons glory ſhould thence forward aſcend and ſpread forth with peace, but that a ſauage nation, as fierce as the Scythians, caſt their eies of deſire vpon that Beautifull Crowne, and preſently attempted, but neuer intermitted any bloody cruelties that could forward the ſame, till they had ſet it on their owne Helmets; and theſe Saxons worn out with reſiſtance, gaue place to the Danes, when time had worne out fiue hundred ſixty three yeeres of their Gouernment.

(5) Theſe Danes thus ſucceeding (though with no better right to enioy) were a ſtout ſturdy Nation, whoſe many Piracies both France and Bretaigne had many times felt, before they attained the end of this their Goale. For theſe, multiplying like Bees in the Hiue, the land of their owne natiuity was too little for each to haue a part: vpon which occaſion a cuſtome was practiſed to baniſh ſome, that the reſt might haue roome. Theſe Exiles therefore (chiefely conſiſting of their youth) fell vpon other Lands with no leſſe danger, then the falling of a ſword out of the ſheath, and greeuouſly wounded whereſoeuer they fell; but no where more deadly then in England. Which for two hundred and eighteene yeeres continuance, they vnceſſantly aſſaulted; ſometimes harrowing the Countrey before them, and carrying away great Booties to their Ships: ſometimes impoſe iſhing the People, by exacting great ſummes of money for compoſition of Peace: ſometimes expelling the Inhabitants, and ſeating themſelues in their places: and ſometimes ſharing the Country with their Kings, and taking vnto themſelues none of the worſt; but not as other Conquerors, to build, ſow, and plant, but to lay waſt, caſt downe, and deſtroy, ſparing neither Erections for ciuill vſe, nor places of Oratory dedicated to diuine. Yet the Garland once gotten by their King Canut, was worne with great glory, and by three of thoſe Daniſh Kings, Englands Crowne was enioyed. The firſt of them Potent, religious, wiſe and iuſt. The ſecond, illegitimate, an vſurper very agill, but idle: And the third a Tyrant, a Taxe-raiſer, laſciuious and a glutton, in which exceſſe at Lambeth he ſuddainely ended his life, when the Land became cleared of the Danes ſore oppreſſions, after they had a long time attempted, and their Kings for fiue and twenty yeeres ſpace worne the royall diademe of this Realme.

(6) Theſe foure Nations fulfilling their times by Heauens aſignement, in gaining, keeping, and againe looſing, the rich Garland of GREAT BRITAINES gouernment: a fift, inferiour to none, made thereunto a double claime, and by a third (more ſure then both) which was, their conquering ſword, got it. Theſe laſt (which I pray may be laſt) were the Normans, a people fierce and valorous, whoſe many Sea-aduentures were ſo great, in the daies of Charles the Great, as that hee wept to for-ſee the harmes they would doe to his in France, which proued ſo many, that Charles the Bald (his Grand-Child) was forced to part with the Earledome of Charters vnto Haſting a Norman; Charles the Groſſe with the County Newſtria, vnto Godfrey their Chieftaine: and Charles the Simple, with all the Conntryes which lay betwixt the Riuer Seine and Loyre, vnto Rollo their Leader, whereof hee became Duke, and that Dutchie from him named Normandy. Whence William the Baſtard the ſeuenth in diſcent, in a bloody field at Battell in Suſſex, wan the Engliſh Crowne from King Harold that held it; when, by changing of Lawes, diſheriting of Nobles, and beſtowing the Lands Reuenewes vpon his, he laid the foundation of a glorious Monarchy. At firſt, ſomewhat bloody, (as Conqueſts commonly proue) and the Crown-

Crowne banded for, among brethren and kindred (as what will not the deſire of a Diademe doe?) the two yonger brethren ſucceſſiuely wearing it, to the preiudice of their* Elder, and Stephen hauing no right, but ſuch as Intruders pretend. But Henrie Plantagenet placed on the Throne, and three hundred thirty one yeeres taken vp in the Raignes of foureteene Kings of his line, their Acts afford matter of more Princely conſequence, their Dominions ſpread wider, themſelues being the lawfull Inheritors to the third part of France, and to the Whole by the Title of their third Edward, and by the Conqueſt of their fifth Henry. And ſurely had not the ciuill diſſenentions of Lancaſter and Yorke ſpent their weapons in the wounds of themſelues, thoſe Kings and their Succeſſours vndoubtedly had been douole crowned euen to this day. But theſe Roſes pluckt off by diſſentious hands, and their branches torne downe in home-bred broyles, their royall roots lay as it were dead in the Earth, till Tender of Lancaſter with Plantagenet of Yorke, gaue them vigor and ſappe by binding both together in wedlockes golden band. Whereby alſo the long dead ſtemme of the ancient Britiſh Kings began againe to bud forth, and fiue renowned Princes of that Sirname ſucceeded in Englands Throne.* The firſt of them, the richeſt, & wiſeſt King of this Weſterne-world:* The Second, the foreſt wonder of the Papall authority;* The third, the forwardeſt in all pious actions.* The fourth the feruenteſt for the Religion of Rome;* And the fifth a Mayden-Queen, the moſt famouſly renowned among the Worlds Monarkes, vnder whoſe raignes on hundred and ſixteen yeeres were fully compleat & run. And were it not that the Engliſh are taxed to be ouermuch addicted vnto vaine Propheſies, and that Merlins was prohibited by decree of Councell, I might alledge his, and that of Aquila at Shaftesbury, both of them foreſhewing that the Britiſh Empire after the Saxons and Normans, ſhould returne againe to her ancient Stocke and Name. Notwithſtanding Truth bids vs acknowledge, how farre God hath accompliſhed both theſe in the royall Perſon of our now-Soueraigne, the one by his diſcent from the loines of that Royall Tuder King Henry the Seuenth; and the other, by his Edict, in reſtoring to the Iland her ancient Name, Brittania: himſelfe being the firſt Monarch of the two Kingdomes Vnion, and the greateſt of Command, ſince Canutus the Dane. The Cordes of whoſe Royall Tents, we pray, may be further extended, that thoſe naked Virginians may be couered vnder the Curtains of his moſt Chriſtian Gouernmēt; and that the Scepter of his Peace may bud, as Aarons Rod in his hand, and in the hand of his Sonne, and Son Sonnes, ſo long as the Sun and Moone endureth.

(7) Theſe then (worthy Reader) are the Heads, whence haue iſſued ſuch plentifull Springs, that now met together in one Body, the Streame is grown very bigge, which thing I euer feared, but could neuer preuent; offending rather with the Niggard who thinketh euery mite too-much, then ſinning with the Prodiall in ſuperfluous exceſſe; ſo plenteous is our Story, and ſo largely requires it to be writ. Through all which my weake body with many yeeres labour hath alone trauelled, aſwell in the reuiewing of the Geographical parts of the Land as in the compiling of the ſucceeding Hiſtory, though farre vnable to perfect either according to their own worths. But leſt the waight of the whole ſhould reſt vpon ſo ſlender a proppe as my ſelfe: I haue laid my buildings vpon far ſtronger arches, as by the many alleaged authorities may appeare. For firſt, the Chards for the moſt part traced by others, and moſt of them diuuilged vnto view, were the foundations of my begun paines; in ſupplying their wants with my many additions, & dimenſions of the Shire-townes, and Cities true platformes. The further deſcriptions of ſundry prouinces, I haue gleaned from the famous workes of the moſt worthy and learned Cambden, whoſe often ſowed ſeedes in that Soile, hath laſtly brought forth a moſt plenteous harueſt. For the body of the Hiſtory, many were the manuſcripts, notes, and Records, wherewith my honoured and learned friends ſupplied me; but none more (or ſo many) as did the worthy repairer of eating Times ruines, the learned Sir Robert Cotten Knight Banoret, another Philadelphus in preſeruing old Monuments and ancient Records: whoſe Cabinets were vnlocked, and Library crntinually ſet open to my free acceſſe; & from whence the chiefeſt garniſhments of this worke haue been enlarged and brought: ſuch as are the antique altars, & Trophies in Stone, by him preſerued from periſhing obliuion; the Coines of gold, ſiluer, alcumy, and copper, of the Britaines, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Engliſh, with the Broad Seales of thoſe Kings ſince the ſame were in vſe: all of them ſo followed from the originall moddles, and moneyes, by the moſt exquiſit and curious hand of our age, as any eie may witnes they are the true prints from thoſe ſtamps. The like moſt acceptable helpes, both of Bookes and Collections, (eſpicially in matters remoter from our times) I continually receiued from that worthy Diuine, Maſter Iohn Barkham, a gentleman compoſed of Learning, Vertue & Curteſie, as being no leſſe ingeniouſly willing, then learnedly able, to aduance and forward all vertuous endeauors. Laſtly for the matters of Herauldrie, the willing and ready paines of Maſter William Smith, Rough Dragon, (an Officer at Armes) was euer at hand: and by theſe hands this building is mounted ſo ſuch an height as thou ſeeſt; which thus now finiſhed, this ſcanted Epitome may well ſerue thy foote ſteppes, as ſtaires to aſcend theſe fiue nationall Stories already finiſhed, and lead thee into the ſixth now moſt happily begun. Where from thoſe thou maieſt behold, how Time hath ſquared the mounted heights, Stones of theſe buildings: how Fortune hath varied in contriuing the Worke: and how the Fates haue erected, poliſhed, & puld down the ſupporting Pillars of GREAT BRITAINES THEATRE. From whoſe Tarras with Dauid caſt not thy luſting eie vpon vnlawfull delights: nor with Babels King boaſt, that his was built by thy owne might: But with Moſes confeſſe, that from a ſmall ſtocke (as a graft of the Lords planting) thou art now growen into a great Nation, mighty, and full of people: And with Salomon make ſupplication vnto thy great Iehouah, that the Arke of his ſtrength may euer reſt in this Houſe, & his eies be euer open thereon day and night. With the Prophet pray that this building may be as beauteous as his, the Foundations laid with Saphires, her Windowes with the Emerands, and her Gates with the Carbuncles: That the deſarts of this choſen Zion may be as Eden, and her wildernes like the Garden of God, watered in due time with the firſt and latter raine; Deut. 11. 13. her Gouernment Peace, her People the Saints of Salnation, and her Kings the Signets on Gods right hand, ſucceſſiuely to ſit on this Royall Throne, till Chriſt the King of Kings ſhall come in the Clowdes, and from the Raine-Bow the Throne of his Maieſty pronounce vs bleſſed, and make vs heires with himſelfe of that Kingdome which neuer ſhall haue end. Vnto which CHRIST, with his FATHER, and HOLY SPIRIT, three in Perſons, but ONE GOD *eternal, vndiuidable in Deity, be aſcribed all Praiſe, Honour, Glory, Wiſdome, Power and Might for euermore.
